THE LORDS AND THE COMMONS.

NOTWITHSTANDING the calm, deliberate, and perhaps designedly slow manner in which the Government, as representing the House of Commons, is dealing with the question of privilege of the Lower House which is involved in the rejection of the Paper Duty Bill by the Lords, there can be little doubt but that the matter has been growing into an importance which ought not to be underrated. Viewing the subject as we do, as one into the dealing with which no heat or rashness should be imported, we have not been inclined to cavil at the course which has been taken. If hereafter the matter should resolve itself into a constitutional struggle, which must eventuate in a final and unimpeachable definition and settlement of the rights and duties of two of the estates of the realm, much will have been gained by the supporters of the immunities of the assembly which represents the people of this country by a temperate and judicious preconsideration of the question in all its bearings. At least it will be impossible to bring any accusations of haste, impatience, and inadvertence against those who may have to immaturity of judgment and unthinkingly for the free and immaculate control and consideration of

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) :—

NAPLES, July 2.—Signor Frecobaldi, the representative of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, has taken down the escutcheon of the Grand Duchy.

PERUGIA, July 3.—A rumour is current that a movement of Roman troops towards the Neapolitan frontiers has taken place.

TURIN, July 5.—The Opinione, in reference to the proposed alliance with Prussia, says:—"The Ministry firmly adhere to their national principle, and refuse to enter into any engagement which might carry them away from the line of policy they have always followed. It is necessary to neutralise to-day the activity of diplomacy, and to isolate Italy, who think that Piedmont, to save the Neapolitan dynasty, should adhere to the Austrian alliance. Such an alliance is inadmissible on account of the opposition of public opinion.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES.

The report of the Committee on Privileges has been the document is simply an elaborate summary of the entries in the journals of the two Houses bearing upon the disputed question, the Committee carefully abstaining from giving any formal statement of opinion with respect to the privileges of the House of Commons. The Privileges Committee appointed last session and very good historical summary of the precedents relating to Taxing Bills, properly so called, and other bills relating charges, deposited under several heads, and has thus presented the House of Commons with all the procurable materials for forming a decision. The report shows that the House of Lords has not been permitted to impose a charge or to meddle in the imposition of one; but that it has exercised the power of rejecting bills creating, and in some rare instances bills repealing, taxes. Mr. Bright (one of the Committee) has issued a pamphlet report—a very different production from his views on the logical result of the investigation that "the Committee cannot doubt that the right which the Commons have exercised over bills of supply is one which nothing less than an absolute control in determining the expenditure necessary for the service of the Crown, and the mode and amount of taxation which shall be imposed upon the people."

Eleven charges were laid by the Committee, the first of which took place on June 1. The summary of precedents, prepared in accordance with a resolution of the Commons, was laid before the members on that day, and the next two divisions took place on the question of a proposed omission from the record of precedents—Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Headley, Mr. J. Talkington, and Mr. Bentinck voting in one sense; and Mr. Bright, Colonel Patten, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Whiteside, Mr. Wilson Patten, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir G. Grey, and Lord Stanley in the other. In the second division Mr. Bright and Mr. Bentinck were tellers.

The consideration of the summary of precedents occupied the attention of the Committee during the five sittings, from June 1 to June 8 inclusive. On June 2, a draught report, proposed by the chairman, Mr. Walpole, and another by Mr. Bright, were laid before the Committee. A division was taken on the question whether the chairman's or Mr. Bright's report should be read a second time, which was carried by a majority of 9 to 5. Both reports were read and approved fourteen votes, viz.—Lord Naas, Colonel Patten, Lord Stanley, Mr. Whiteside, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Wilson Patten, Mr. Hanbury, Mr. Graham, Mr. Massey, Sir G. Grey, Sir J. Talbington, Mr. Heath, Lord Hotham, and Lord Naas. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord John Russell, and Mr. Bright voted for Mr. Bright's report. Seven amendments were proposed and negatived, and other adopted without a division.

The amendment proposed by Mr. Gladstone at the sitting of the 7th—"to add to the report a recital of the fact that the House of Lords, approved by the House, has for its object to repeal any tax constituting a large branch of the revenue of an impending session, and to substitute for it a tax which they rejected or altered some had the supply preamble; but it cannot be certainly asserted that in all these cases the rejection or alteration of a tax excess the charge laid upon the nation. From the subjects and terms of the bill, or the circumstances, it is in many instances impossible to form a judgment with an legislative grounds other than those of finance; nor is there any case before enquiry which can be said to be conclusive. Lord Naas, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Collier, Sir G. Grey, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord J. Russell voted for the adoption of the report paragraph, and also for the report as a whole, by a majority of two against the paragraph.

A paragraph proposed by Lord J. Russell, "For the rejection by the Lords of a bill repealing a burden of more than a million of pounds a year upon a branch of industry, for the repeal of which the House of Commons has also rejected by a majority of two.

Mr. Bright's report in the following paragraph :—"It does not appear that the House of Lords has in any case, before the year 1860, rejected any bill giving away or imposing, remitting or repealing taxes, which had originated with the quantum of ways and means required by the House of Commons for the services of the year." Members of the Committee voting for it—Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Collier, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord J. Russell, voted for the paragraph; and Lord Naas, Colonel Patten, Lord Stanley, Mr. Whiteside, Sir G. Grey, voted against it.

The following paragraph was also proposed by Mr. Bright to be inserted in the report :—"It may be well to state some facts in the ordinary practice of Parliament connected with this subject-matter, especially as the House speaks only to the Commons at the opening and closing of each Session, or by message, during the Session, relative to the subjects of grants and supply for the service of the year. The Lords are not asked for money, and are not thanked by the Crown for the money granted; the annual estimates are never presented by the speaker of the House of Commons to the Sovereign, and not, as other bills, by the Clerk of the Crown of the House of Lords. The Crown does not order estimates of expenditure to be laid before the Lords; they are furnished only to the Commons; and they never receive any formal information relating to taxation and expenditure the Commons never send to the Lords, even though the Lords may desire it, any estimate to be furnished to them; therefore, have no official knowledge of the necessities of the Crown; they cannot guess at what they are here proposed to vote for the service of the year, and hence they are not responsible for providing any portion of the supplies." Mr. Bright's proposed paragraph, with the exception of the words Sir J. Graham; in the minority in this the last division were Lord Palmerston, Mr. Bright, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Collier, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord J. Russell.

On Saturday last William MacBride, a gunner of the Royal Artillery, who was an inmate of the infirmary, was found in one of the wards with his head severed from the body. The deceased had been there for a few years in the service, but recently given way to intemperate habits, which resulted in delirium tremens.

CONSULS.—The Queen has appointed G. Taylor, Esq., now her British Vice-Consul, to be her Majesty's Consul at Dieppe; and John Ward, Esq., now her Majesty's Consul-General in the Kingdom of Hanover, the Grand Duchies of Oldenburg and Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and the Duchies of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenberg, and to be her Majesty's Charge d'Affaires and Consul-General in the Republic of Hamburg and the Hanse Towns. Mr. Ashcroft; also John Archer Crowe, Esq., to be her Majesty's Consul-General in the Kingdom of Saxony.

TESTIMONIAL.—On Thursday se'nnight there was a Conservative demonstration at Rochdale, when the presentation of a silver candlestick and an address to Sir Alexander Haussay, Bart., the late representative of the borough in Parliament, took place. Previous to eating of a thousand guineas and a splendid silver salver, has been presented to the late Mayor, Mr. Mingay, and a gold watch and chain to Mr. Hardman, on his retirement from the ministry, by his congregation.—On Thursday were a purse containing a thousand guineas, a splendid silver salver, and a handsome memorial of esteem and affection, were presented to the Rev. M. L. Jones, on his leaving Lake College, for Worthington, Lancashire. He also received a valuable copy of Dean Trench's "Notes on the Miracles of our Lord," from some of the members of the Church Choir's district, on the day of the Evening School and boys of the Sunday School, and a purse of gold from the congregation of Lake Church. In the evening Mrs. Jones was presented with a handsome gold watch; also John Archer Crowe, Esq., to be her Majesty's Consul-General in the Kingdom of Saxony.

THE CHINESE WAR.—Some weeks since Lord Clarence Paget devised, for reasons he thought sufficiently weighty, to give the exact amount of our naval force employed in the Chinese waters during the year 1865. The following particulars will be interesting to the public at a time when, in all probability, more ships are going to and, as we hope, coming from China, the most reliable sources, they may be depended upon. We have two Admirals—Sir Michael Seymour and Mr. Hope, C.B., and Captain Sir W. Jones, C.B., 1 commodore, 12 captains, 1 acting captain, 17 commanders, 2 acting commanders, 1 staff-commander, 1 staff-surgeon, 1 paymaster, and 1 acting-paymaster. There are serving under these officers, in addition to a number for disposal in the event of casualties, the usual complement of officers and men, according to the ratings of the different ships. There are 39 effective vessels in commission, carrying 400 guns, having a total tonnage of 60,000 tons and 10,000 horse-power. There are also some on the books of the flag-ship Chesapeake two battalions of Royal Marine Light Infantry, and a detachment of the Royal Marine Artillery, making together some 1800 men. We have, therefore, in addition to the army dispatched from India and from England, 9000 sailors and marines to bring against the Chinese. We have not taken into account the vessels in the service of the late East India Company's Navy, as they are chiefly employed on other parts of the station, and hitherto have not taken part in the war with China. We have also omitted the transport service, store-ships, or hospital-ships, of which there are several.—Army and Navy Gazette.—The hostile tone which the Mahometan journals of India have required to be noted towards defraying the expenses of naval and military operations in China, by the ordinary grants for the service of the year, instead of facing for the present including a repayment of £443,896 to the Government of India for advances on account of former expenditure in China. The sum in question is £7,400,000.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

MR. Bingham, the senior magistrate at the Marlborough-street Police Office, has retired in consequence of ill health.

A fire broke out on Wednesday night at the type-foundry of Messrs. Figgins, in West-street, Smithfield, and the loss of property is considerable.

At the Southwark Police Court, on Wednesday, Miss Kettle was fined £10 or, in default, two months' imprisonment, for conveying a quantity of gin into the Queen's Prison, for the use of a prisoner. The gin was intended for a blacker which Miss Kettle wore as a bustle.

THE BARROW SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY DINNER, on the Wednesday evening upwards of seventy noblemen and gentlemen sat down to a sumptuous dinner at the Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street, to commemorate the foundation of the famous school of Harrow, at which they had been educated. The chair was occupied by Lord Lyttelton, the head master.

An inquest on the body of John Dehrang, who committed suicide in Hyde Park last week, and who previously murdered his wife in his lodgings in Oxford-street, has been held, and a verdict returned in accordance with the fact that he committed suicide while in a state of insanity. The Coroner's jury, however, declined to inquire into the manner in which the death brought in a verdict of "Wilful murder" against Dehrang.

THE AMERICAN ANNIVERSARY DINNER.—The eighty-fourth anniversary of American independence was celebrated on Wednesday evening by a dinner at the London Tavern, presided over by General Campbell, the American Minister. The company included Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, Mr. Peter McDallas, American Minister; Mr. Crosby, General Macdonald, Dr. Mackay, the Archbishop of Dublin, Mr. Spurgeon, and about one hundred gentlemen more or less connected with the United States. The dinner was of excellent quality, and the arrangements altogether gave unmixed satisfaction.

AN IMPORTANT TRIAL has been going on in the Court of Exchequer, in connection with the serious accident which lately took place at the Abergwynfi Colliery, in Glamorganshire, whereby 114 persons lost their lives by one of the leading wheels of the engine. The plaintiff in this action was a widow, whose husband was one of the unfortunate victims. The defence was that the accident was occasioned by the inherent defects of the machinery, and not by any negligence on the part of the company. The trial terminated on Wednesday, the jury returning a verdict for the plaintiff—damages £200.

STEALING GOLD SPECTACLES FROM A GENTLEMAN'S FACE.—Frederick Stirling, alias Phillip Owen, a negro, who in 1859 was committed for six months' imprisonment for stealing a pocket-book, was charged at the Southwark Police Court, last Saturday, with stealing a pair of gold spectacles from the face of Mr. Joseph Lewis, of Camberwell. The prisoner said he was going into his hotel—the Salisbury—about half-past ten the previous night, when he accidentally came in contact with the gold spectacles, of the value of £7, from his face. The prisoner, against whom, it was stated, there were several charges of felony, was fully committed for trial.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF A NEW CHURCH.—On Tuesday last the stone of the new District Church of St Ann's, Hanger-lane, Stamford Hill, was laid, by the Rev. Thomas Hill, rector of Stoke Newington, assisted by the wife of Fowler Newsum, Esq., of Stamford Hill, at whose sole expense the same is being erected, from designs by Mr. Habershon, architect, of Bedford-row. The design is by Mr. Talbot Bury. It has and spire and transepts, and will seat 600 persons. The cost, including the site, is estimated at £4,000, and the parsonage £3000. Two years back, the munificent founder of this district church, in the same locality, built a handsome school and some model cottages.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 859 boys and 872 girls—in all 1731 children—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the last five years the average number was 1656. The deaths registered in London in the week that ended last Saturday were 1264. The number of deaths registered in the week was 1264, being 1 more than the previous week. In the ten years 1856-65 the average number registered in the previous corresponding week was 1,200. Five infants were suffocated in bed, and the wife of a coalwhipper was suffocated by the falling of a heap of coals. Two accidental deaths by fire were registered, and one death from sunstroke. Four nonagenarians died during the week, two of whom were of 91 each years, and one of 92, and another the age of ninety-seven years.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.—The Exhibition of the Society for Promoting the Employment of Women, in connection with the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, was opened on Monday ago. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided, and delivered the opening address. Lord Lyttelton, Lord Stanley, Mr. Cowper Temple, M.P., and others spoke. Papers were contributed by Miss Parkes, Miss Boucherett, and Miss Emily Faithfull. Specimens of the productions of female labour were shown in women into the printing trade. The difficulties supposed to be insurmountable, and that by the aid of machinery the compositor's work might be done by men and other specimens of plain and ornamental printing were exhibited, and elicited much commendation. Miss Faithfull announced that on the 25th of last March, and is already profiting which shows good use of Saxonnaise, and that the Queen's printer, Mr. Victoria Press is no longer an experiment, but a great success."

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, LONDON.—On Tuesday the annual distribution of prizes to the students of the Queen's College took place, under the presidency of Lord Stanley, M.P. Professor Cowper, the Principal of the College, in his report, congratulated them on the favourable account of the progress of the college. It stated that the number of students in the college during the past year was 220, and in the Preparatory session, against 206 last year, and 176 the preceding year, at which time the numbers reached 250. The Professor of Mathematics (Mr. Hayward) had masters' classes for four years together there had been a steady and rapid increase. The Professor of Hebrew (Dr. Kalisch) had given up his class for this decrease could be pointed out it had appeared to the professors that those students who had left the college previously to the Christmas of Andrews Scholarships of £60 each were awarded last October to Mr. Julian Cleveland and Mr. Arthur Lee Peel. The Hebrew Scholarship, founded in memory of the late Professor Bellamy, by the friends of philosophy, history of moral philosophy, and civil engineering.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM.—On Tuesday, M. G. S. Brent, Deputy-Coroner for West Middlesex, concluded an inquiry at the Bull Inn, Bull-lane, Holloway-road, into the circumstances attending the death of Miss Ann Page, aged seventeen, whose remains were found in the New River, on the previous day, in New River at Highbury-vale, in company with a female friend, who fortunately was rescued. Mr. Page, father of the deceased, a respectable tailor, and was residing in St. John-street-road, and the survivor in Coppice-row, Clerkenwell. They became acquainted with a young man named Wilson, a journeyman tailor, and were much attached to each other. LITERATURE.

A Second Series of Vicissitudes of Families. By Sir Bernard Burke, Ulster King of Arms. Longmans and Co.

Sir Bernard does well to thus follow up a subject which the success of his first series shows to be so popular with the public. This second series is full of records of equal if not increased marvel; for instance, the very first story is a startling one. It tells of the proud Conyers, Lords of Sockburn, in the county of Durham, and of the last chief of that stately and ancient race, Sir Thomas Conyers, the ninth and final heritor, who recovered a poor old pauper in the workhouse of Chester-le-Street. The eminent Robert Surtees, the historian of Durham, on being informed of this circumstance, called the Gentleman's Magazine to his aid, and by their joint efforts a subscription was set on foot, headed by the Bishop of Durham. But it was too late to do much. Sir Thomas died in a more public abode, but he died shortly after, leaving three daughters, married to working men, in Chester-le-Street; and so perished he and his baronetcy—for whose ancestor was Conestede de Surtees, Durham in the Conqueror's time. Few novelists would have ventured on such a tale as this, and, even if they did, they could not relate it with the freshness with half the force that does the plain and terrible truth as here narrated. Ex uno disce omnes; and we may safely say that each vicissitude thus follows in the book is a record that points a moral and makes the reader thoughtful. The political madness of the O'Connors, with Feargus, M.P., dying a lunatic; the hoarded gold of Strives, the miser, not saving his descendants from poverty, the present Sir Henry Elwes being next to the Queen's Head, Margate; the wasted inheritance of the Myttons, of Halston; the fall of the Luards of Callendar; the bodice-maker and Prince George of Denmark to dinner at Bristol and becoming a knight;—these are tales of absorbing interest, and make the whole work a real romance. The Bonapartes is a curious article, where Sir Bernard proves that the Napoleons have no history, if not as bad as history, at least almost as old, as that of the Bourbons. The article on the wanderings of the Lauder of Lauderdale corrects the vulgar notion that the great financier John Law was a mere adventurous upstart. He was, it seems, of an ancient Scottish house, and allied to the ducal family of Argyll and to other of the best blood in Scotland. This second series of "Vicissitudes" forms a duplicate to the novelty and charm of the first.

Stray Notes on Fishing and Natural History. By Cornwall Simeon. Macmillan and Co.

This book is neither more nor less than a number of notes on fishing and natural history thrown together without any particular plan. "Dear old Izaak Walton" seems to have been Mr. Simeon's patron saint on the cue point, and in the latter he rather wanders out of the Seiborne category, and includes hawks, foxes, and rats in his range. His fishing hints begin at the very foundation, with gimp, trebles, gut, and spoon-bait; and we are also guided carefully among the mysteries of kill-devils, tell-tales, and make-shift gaffs. Carp, "that leather-mouthed fish, which doth seldom break his hold," seem, along with jack, to be his peculiar favourites; and we have here an open confession as to the value of his long-vacation studies in Zeschylus, when he was engaged in fishing for the grasshopper as a minnow-bait near a pond.

The best story in the book is the one which winds up the fishing section. He had been busy with his line from a boat in the Ness when he saw a cow equally busy in examining his nacintosh, which he had left on the shore. On trying subsequently to get it on, it transpired that she had eaten the batton half of it. Remonstrance with her owner, a miller, was perfectly useless. His sympathies were all with the kettle one, but with his cow, and, when the full nature of the calamity was explained to him, he merely scratched his head and spake thus—"Eh, puir thing, but she'll no be better for the buttons!"

The natural-history part is full of quaint observations and anecdotes; and the one about the lively parrot, whose owner said he couldn't be trained to be sensible, and yet made a remarkable (and, we regret to say, unparliamentary) observation, which procured him the place in a congress of parrot-fanciers, is almost too good to be true. The dissertation on foxes is not so delightful, as it only furnishes reasons for game-preservers who desire to nip every fox's toes they can find, by showing the cruelty of the young pheasant slaughter they cause. "Velveteens" need no precedents to guide them in this trap practice; but we cannot help admiring the tact of the author when he says that he tells these stories merely to show what sacrifices fox-preservers are forced to make, and to elicit suitable gratitude from the hunting-men.

We could have wished for a more taking name for the volume, as many readers who know what would have harmonised remarkably well with letterpress of this kind. The only two ensuist of a terrier bringing a cod to land, at the edge of a sea-loch, and a huge quarter in Argyleshire, which any experimentalist would have esteemed a picture "worthy of his steel." Let our author take the hint in a second edition.

Fame Ridens. By J. Ribell Dunbar. Saunders and Otley.

As long as there are writers to sell worthily of the glories of Doncaster Moor and Crauna Cross, very little interest can accrue to a libel to be awakened for the practice of Rotten Row. Mr. Dunbar has, however, done the most for an unpromising subject, as those who do not care to content themselves with the perusal of what the Cantabs term "hookworks," and wish to "read" the problem under his guidance, need only retrace their steps to the scene of Mr. Harvey's pugilistic set at the Riding House, Motcombe-street. The philosopher Des Cartes maintained that the horses' think, and, if they do, they have long since come to the conclusion that heels are but rude teachers, and that head and hands are better. If this be the principle, hands have a long and very sensible chapter to themselves, and well it would have been for horses if such principles had been laid down two hundred years ago, when the curse rigorous system was considered the best breaker, and it was the height of wisdom to "at rate your nag with a terrible vopey, and beate him pitifully with a good sticke upon the head, between the ears." Kicking, rearing, shying, plunging, running away, and restiveness, with their antidotes, are all handled in detail; and the treatise concludes with some golden maxims, culled from the best professors of riding, from Xenophon downwards. The illustrations are divided equally between lady and gentlemen equestrians; but with regard to "The United Seat" we can safely aver that almost any father would feel tempted to cut off his son with a shilling if he met him practising it in a cross-legged saddle at such a pace as the decoughfare, and looking half as foolish as "the frightful example."

The Grand Volunteer Review. By George Augustus Sala. Tinsley.

This is a narrative of the volunteer review in Hyde Park, and is meant to commemorate that event for those who saw it, and to inform those who did not with regard to its features and general aspect. It has been compiled by Mr. Sala from authentic sources, and having been himself a witness of the spectacle, and, we believe, drawn some vigorous-and-ink sketches of it in his peculiar racy and powerful style, he has been enabled to add to this publication such additional particulars as were likely to come under his perceptive eye. The idea of a record of this kind was a good one, and the selection of Mr. Sala for carrying it into execution a further proof of sound judgment.

THE MAGAZINES.

A consideration of the serial publications for the present month will probably lead to the conclusion that they are, as a whole, characterised by a steadiness of quality rather than by any striking features or unusual brilliancy. Taking Blackwood as the first among the series, by right of seniority at any rate, it may be said that it is also entitled to precedence, to a great extent, on the score of merit. The article on "Sir Robert Wilson's Secret History of the Russian Campaign in 1812" is written with a sound knowledge of the immediate events and contemporary circumstances of the period; and if there are any persons desirous of knowing all about the matter in hand, with the best illustrations of particular occurrences, without reading the book itself, we can confidently recommend this treatise to them. The next most prominent article is that entitled "An Election in France," which, looking to the facts and documents which are brought together, of the genuineness of which there can be no doubt, it is a commentary on the entire gulf of universal suffering on the other side of the water which places its working in a serio-comic point of view. The article on "The Reform Bill and the Tory Party" rather points out a notion which has been gaining ground of late that the object of the tactics of the representatives of the Conservative party in Parliament is rather a desire to weed the present Government of Lord John Russell, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Milner Gibson, and Mr. Charles Villiers—that is to say, the whole of the Bright influence—and then to support Lord Palmerston against the extreme Liberals, than to press a return to office of a Derby-Disraeli Cabinet. The fifth and sixth volumes of Froude's English History, including the reigns of Edward VI. and Mary, form the subject of the first article in Fraser, and the author receives excellent and at the same time judicious treatment. The account given by Lord Bury of "The Volunteer Course at Hythe School of Musketry" is particularly well-timed and admirably written, all the details plain and intelligible, while nothing can be more graphic than the general history of that fourteen days' devotion to that branch of their duty which alone seems now wanting to make our volunteer force a great reality. It is very satisfactory to learn that even this comparatively brief training is rifle-shooting is calculated to sow the seed, and something more, of perfection in this indispensable function of our soldiery, regular and irregular. There is, happily, incidental evidence to be found here of the fact that the British Army proper is fast becoming a body of practised shooters with the rifle. "Social and Political Life Five-and-Thirty Years Ago" is an article of singular compass and knowledge of the outer and inner history of a time which, not so far removed from our own, presents as remarkable a contrast to the tastes, habits, and feelings of the year of Grace 1860 in England. The new feature of this magazine—namely, the "Chronicle of Current History"—is produced this month under some disadvantage, inasmuch as in a comparatively brief space it has to comprehend the events of the last six months; and of necessity everything is touched with a lighter and less discerning hand than will probably be the case when the chronicle is confined to the period of four weeks.

The Cornhill opens with a reproduction of the first of Mr. Thackeray's series of lectures on the "Georges." We do not say that it is not a very proper proceeding, considering the interest, both literary and historical, which attaches to these lectures, to offer them in their present shape to the numerous readers of this magazine—those who heard them delivered must have been comparatively few, and, even though they have been published in a volume of themselves, yet it is probable that they are more likely to reach more of those who are no doubt desirous of becoming acquainted with them by the means now employed than they have hitherto done. It may, however, be hinted, with all deference, that the preservation of the exact form of lectures, so that it every now and then happens that phrases which are applicable only to a rural race address have been retained, as, for instance, "are there not scores of ladies in this audience who persist in it too" rather detracts from their perfection when read. However, this is probably a piece of that hypercriticism against which the editor so good-humouredly and so wittily protests in the "Roundabout Paper" on this month, and which, under the head of "Thorns in the Cushion," gives us such a graphic tale of the troubles and sorrows of editing. The latter word is directly applicable to at least one incident in the article which is related with a pathos and a feeling which are worthy of the heart of the writer. "Frankey Parsonage" is very good, the interest rising, and the smart—no, not smart—the delicate point and humour of the style, so far from flagging, rather more largely pervading it. Without exactly being able to say to show why, we have felt this to be a peculiarly satisfactory number of the Cornhill as a whole. The first thing that is probably observable in Macmillan is the somewhat antithetical grouping of articles, as an article on "American College Life" in a magazine in which "Tom Brown at Oxford" is appearing in places. "Tom Brown at Cambridge," by Sir Bernard Burke, is the author of a work entitled "Five Years in an English University," and is therefore very well fitted to deal with the subject. We confess that we should like the absence of Tom, as a wellacademical life, in the larger sense of the term, in the United States which we entertained before reading the article under the head of paper. We had not supposed that young Americans were in the habit of going steadily through a university curriculum of four years' duration; but it seems that is pretty generally the case at Yale College, at which the article treats, and there is as decided a college life there as we have in our Universities, though in the latter the characteristic is it partakes more of the German student-life than that of Oxford and Cambridge. Among the other articles, which are numerous this month, that on "Garibaldi and the Sicilian Revolution," written by Aurelio Saffi, and a translation from the Italian of a poem by Guiseppe Giusti, entitled "The Boot," that is Italy, will probably attract attention.

The French Treaty of Commerce is reviewed with considerable ability and no little knowledge of the subject in the Dublin University. It is an able summing up of the case, and there is certain leaning expressed in the phrase whether "the ambitious speculation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has, in dropping the substance of valuable revenue in pursuit of augmented trade, grasped at a shadow, or has on the contrary, inaugurated a new era of unparalleled prosperity?" In connection with this subject it would be well to read the paper headed "The Work-a-day-World of France." There is an exhaustive review of "Bement's Ceylon," which, considering the number of editions that work has gone through, is by no means out of date, although so many months have elapsed since the first publication of the book. The great latter-day Roman Tribune Rienzi has been tolerably worked as a subject for romance and the drama; but here we have him delineated rather more as an actuality, and an actuality which can be authentically was. The biographic "Sketches of the Marshals of Napoleon I." are continued, and with

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Councillors of Burghs and Burgesses (Scotland) Bill was read a third time and passed, as were the Highland Roads and Bridges Bill.

The Caledonian and Crinan Canals Bill, the Inland Bonding Bill, and the Criminal Lunatic Asylum Bill were read a second time, the last to the Committee.

The Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill passed through Committee.

REFORM IN INDIA.—The Duke of ARGYLL and Lord CHELMSFORD moved that the British Government in India, as the representative of the British nation, is charged with the duty of promoting the moral and material welfare of the people of that country and that, in order effectually to perform such object, it is the duty of the Home Government to take the earliest occasion of the Word of God from the course of education afforded in the schools to be removed; and colleges and colleges, and public institutions established in that country, and humbly to address her Majesty that she will be graciously pleased to give such directions to the Government of India as may be best calculated to give effect to such resolution.

Lord STANLEY moved the previous question, which was at once agreed to, and the subject dropped.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The order for the Committee on County Prisons (Ireland) Bill was discharged.

The Post Law Board Continuance Bill was read a second time, after some discussion, in which a strong opinion was expressed by many members that the period for the continuance of the system should be one year only.

The Militia Bill was read a second time.

NAVIES.—In answer to Mr. H. B. Sheridan, Lord J. RUSSELL said it was true that the lazzaroni of Naples were in a state of disfranchisement, and had struck down and injured the Parliament men. In the event of any such break on the part of the lazzaroni, the English representative had full instructions and authority to demand satisfaction from the English residents at Naples.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS.—In answer to Mr. AYRTON, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the Government and the Union Bill would be laid on the table immediately, and, after the estimate was voted, a statement would be made with regard to the new annual necessary to meet it.

THE NEUTRALISED DISTRICTS OF SAVOY.—In answer to Sir R. Peel, Lord J. RUSSELL said that the Government had received the Sardinian Minister's Bill, had accepted the offer of a Conference with reference to the annexation of Savoy and its neutralisation, and had invited Prussia and the Russian Government had also signified its assent to that course.

THE EUROPEAN FORCES (INDIA) BILL.

The adjourned debate on this bill was resumed by

Mr. BUCK, who opposed any change in the system of a local European force in India.

Mr. TORRENS expressed a similar opinion.

Sir DE L. EVANS said that the belief that it was not intended to produce any papers which would afford information on the subject of the bill until after the question had been settled was a great cause of alarm. He had never yet in all the three presidencies in India, and having seen something of the local force there, in which the Queen's regiments were associated, come to close quarters with the enemy, but he had seen the Queen's troops victorious. It appeared from the papers which had at length been laid on the table that Sir Colin Campbell and Sir W. Mansfield against the local force, especially with regard to the mutiny, had been greatly exaggerated. He (Sir De L. Evans) was a friend of Sir Colin Campbell's of long standing, and stated the arguments they used in favour of a local force, and he doubted that the Government, after the full and able discussion that had taken place in opinion, it was now proved that the conduct of the men ought not to be considered as an argument of any ground in support of the bill. He (Sir De L. Evans) was a friend of Sir Colin Campbell's of long standing, and stated the arguments they used in favour of a local force, and he doubted that the Government, after the full and able discussion that had taken place in opinion, it was now proved that the conduct of the men ought not to be considered as an argument of any ground in support of the bill. He (Sir De L. Evans) was a friend of Sir Colin Campbell's of long standing, and stated the arguments they used in favour of a local force, and he doubted that the Government, after the full and able discussion that had taken place in both the native and European forces.

Mr. TAYLOR supported the bill, and urged delay in coming to a decision upon it.

Mr. CRAWFORD, Sir P. Smith, Colonel Sykes, Major Parker, and Colonel North having spoken,

Sir C. WOOD replied to the general arguments which had been brought forward, justifying the change which had taken place in his opinion on the ground that the whole of the circumstances which had been given were sufficient to have influenced his mind, as they had the minds of Lord Clyde, Sir Patrick Grant, and Sir Hugh Rose, in having given up the local European force. He had after careful and long deliberation, he had heard nothing in the course of the debate, however, to alter his decision in which he was joined by Lord CLYDE. He then gave a sketch of the circumstances which led to the present proposal for abolishing the local force, and argued generally against abolishing the local force.

Colonel DUNNE spoke in a similar sense.

Mr. AYRTON defended the course pursued by the Secretary for India with reference to the production of papers, which he considered was a matter of discretion, and argued in favour of the proposed change, which was justified by the failure of the local force referred to by the gallant officer who had taken place in both the native and European forces.

Mr. DAVID URQUHART opposed the bill, and urged delay in coming to a decision upon it.

Mr. CRAUFURD, Sir P. Smith, Colonel Sykes, Major Parker, and Colonel North having spoken,

Sir C. WOOD replied to the general arguments which had been brought forward, justifying the change which had taken place in his opinion on the ground that the whole of the circumstances which had been given were sufficient to have influenced his mind, as they had the minds of Lord Clyde, Sir Patrick Grant, and Sir Hugh Rose

THE FARM.

With the last day of June the rain deluge, from which Scotland and some of the northern counties have enjoyed a comparative immunity, came to a merciful close. So hopeless had the hay prospects round London become that washed-out haymakers had begun to patrol its thoroughfares with ropes instead of sickles and doleful ditties. From Mr. Cuthbert Johnson's calculations in the Farmers' Magazine, we find that in all only eighteen days between the 1st of May and the end of June, at Mr. Glaisher's, the Croydon rain-gauge stood at 8.16. The country, under such a visitation, had begun to wear a perfectly sodden aspect, but a few days of sun have wonderfully set matters to rights, and brought the mowers, both of flesh and iron, into active requisition. Where it continues wet, as in the Eight Bell meadows, looks most discouraging. Nearly everywhere the hay crop has shown a set in the opposite direction, and the sanguine anticipations of the tares and clover crops reports are generally pretty favourable. The coldness of the season has suited the broad species, and we believe the London cowkeepers never looked forward with so much confidence to plenty of fouls next year. Young chickens have been sadly stunted by the unusual backwardness, and have not been very carefully shut up there is scarcely a brood to be found.

The high price of butchers' meat seems likely to bind over to keep together in a more permanent league than ever, at least till things mend a little. The Mark Lane Express, in a very equitable article, points out that the butchers are unjustly blamed in the matter, and that they are not so well off as when the price was twenty-five per cent lower. Many causes have contributed to bring beef and mutton up to 5s. 8d. per stone at the new London Cattle Market. Besides those which had to be sent to market half fat, both to Scotland, Ireland, and the north of England, the hides are being perished by thousands, and in London the cattle shared the same fate by hundreds from absolute starvation. The aggregate increase of the importations (although large when compared with last year as regards sheep) did little towards filling up the void. In suggesting that farmers should do more in the way of rearing lambs and calves, the writer says that the loss of foreign stock through disease from the state of the French market, where a fillet of veal has been selling at 4s. 6d. per lb., is a proof of the impolicy of not steadily stalling the return of profit is wanted, it may be found in the result of the system in France. Out of 4,000,000 head of the bovine race slaughtered in that country 2,000,000 are killed in the month of one month old, averaging not more than 90 kilogrammes (or about 60lb). each. The consumption of this butchers' meat is at the same time so it is in England, in general, although the average consumption of the whole population is not much more than half that of England. The 2,000,000 of calves killed in the latter country are for the most part produce upwards of 1100 million lb. of meat, or an average of about 40 stone each; while the 4,000,000 in France yield only 883,000,000lb., or about 16 stone each."

The Royal Agricultural Show at Canterbury, for which the South-Eastern Railway Company has made suitable arrangements for the visitors at the showground, commences in earnest on Monday at Canterbury, when the judging of the stock will be open at seven o'clock, and the cattle-yard at about two. We have received the following note on the Herefords:—"In the aged bull class we shall expect to see Lord Berwick's Severn, winner of the silver cup at Windsor, and Mr. Arkwright's more honourable position; also his Lordship's cow, Beauty, with some other gems from his splendid herd. Lord Leigh's Sovereign's herd will also be well represented in, we believe, nearly every class. The Rose, father and son, will also seek additional honours to their well-known names as Hereford breeders. In the yearling bull class Mr. Perry is determined, if possible, to rob his Royal Highness of the honours won by Prince of Wales last year. We presume, also, that Mr. Price's explanation from the Herefordshire society, and subsequently that of the R.A.S., will prevent any animals from the celebrated Rumbridge herd of Mr. Hewer from the Wye Valley, and the herds of the Rev. A. Clive, of Whitfield, or Mr. Duckham, editor of the "Hereford Herd Book," from the Vale of Gloucester and Dodderhill, from the herd by the late Mr. James, of Mappowder, Dorsetshire, carrying similar honours to those he won in the late meeting at Dorchester." Of the Devons our correspondent says:—"Many breeders from the west will exhibit at Canterbury who did not at Dorchester, owing mainly to their want of confidence in the Royal and West of England shows, over the prizes which have generally been reversed at the Royal Agricultural Society's Show; besides which the animals are fagged from having been previously exhibited in the country. There may have been more shows of Devons than there will be at Canterbury (there will be a good many now), but the quality will be greater than it has been for many years." The long distance, and the difficulty of getting them from railway to railway through London, will naturally tend to thin the entries generally, but we have no doubt the Shorthorn classes especially will make some very choice specimens, and we have seen or heard of four or five young bulls that would be good winners in the yearling class. In the cow class Mr. Stutton will not be represented, as Sultana 2nd has suffered from her journey to Dorchester and Salisbury, and The Sea has been obliged to decline the trouble of a visit to Kent reserve her aspirations for Baker-street. Hence the Broughton lot this year will consist of only Mr. Stutton's Sir Arthur and Mr. Bell's Lord Lyon, and Mr. Richard Booth will send, we believe, about four each; Sir Charles Tempest and Mr. Hawkes, two; and Colonel Towneley, about a dozen. "The Scottish five" has been very often mentioned in the case of Mr. Strafford's nostrum; but, as some of its best breeders do not approve of forcing, it is not likely that it will be held in its entirety under the united assault of Yorkshire and Lancashire.

Mr. Tory's 300-guinea bull has had a red roan heifer by Britain, bred recently. Six have arrived in succession from Minstrel 2nd, Coral, Orphanim 2nd, Mayflower, Laurel, and Moonlight 2nd, the last of which has been christened Thomasby. Six of their elders are for sale, including Mr. Tory's, 19th Dukes of Oxford, Mr. Bell's, and formerly of them are from Oxford 15th, and the latter from her daughter Countess of Oxford. Mr. Duckham has sold his bull Franklyn, winner of the second prize in the two-year-old class at Dorchester, to another young one from his herd, to go to Australia. His celebrated cow, Dahlia, has also taken a first prize in her class for the Carlisle, Chelmsford, and Salisbury meeting, has a bull calf by Franklyn.

From our telegram just received we find that the forty lots at Mr. Robert Colling's sale realised 2,870*l.*, or thirty-three guineas each, about 83 gs. each, and seven bulls 85 gs. each.

There was a large sale on Friday last. The late Sir W. F. Middleton's consists principally of carthorses, Devons, and 1200 Southdown sheep and lambs, at Shrubland Park, near Ipswich; Mr. John Overman, Mr. Richard Overman, Messrs. Hall, and Mr. Lee are owners of a large number of draughts, "to avoid giving any undue preference," from his Hampshire farm at Beck; and Mr. Fowler, of Bacton-on-Sandy, Bedfordshire, who is forming a shorthorn herd, offers, without reserve, his flock of pure Leicesters, consisting of 100 rams and 150 ewes and theaves. Besides their local-show winnings, his rams have even twenty-five prizes at the meetings of the Royal Agricultural Society.

The Agricultural Benefit Society's Institution made a move on Monday. Mr. Wren Hoskyns (who never spoke better, although only asked to preside at the eleventh hour) as the chairman at its dinner. Already the subscriptions and donations amount to 6,000*l.*, and with this strange indeed if the farmers prove laggards in such a noble cause, and allow mere prejudice against Mr. Mechi to warp them into indifference or opposition.

A NOVEL WEATHER INDICATOR.—In several large farmhouses kitchens, according to a correspondent of the Builder, a bench is put into a clear glass bottle full of water, the latter being removed every forenoon, by the cook, to the well to be filled with fresh water from the bottle; if the day is to be showery it occupies a place about the centre (upwards of the bottle); and as the day is to be more changing the bench will be nearer the water. A gentleman in this town informs me that he has tried this for the last seven months and found it exceedingly correct: ten times more or less true than any glass, patent or otherwise.—Notes and Queries.

INAUGURATION OF THE MONUMENT TO THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.—The statue of James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, was inaugurated on Thursday week on the grounds of Chapelhope, in the Vale of Yarrow. The site is said to have been pointed out by Christopher North, in the "Noctes," in 1826. The statue is of feet in height, on a pedestal 9½ feet high; and is of Sicilian marble, executed by Mr. Handyside Ritchie, of Rome. A procession of shepherds took place on the inauguration-day; and an oration was delivered by Professor Aytoun. The proceedings concluded at the subsequent dinner; the Hon. William Napier officiating as Croupier.

MUSIC.

"Oberon," the latest fruit of the genius of Weber, has been revived at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. It was performed for the first time, in an Italian version of course, on Tuesday last, and repeated on Thursday. We hope that its success will repay to the spirited lessee the great amount of expense and trouble which its production must have entailed.

"Oberon," we may remind our readers, is originally an English opera. It was composed for Covent Garden Theatre when that theatre was under the management of Mr. Charles Kemble, the libretto having been written by our veteran dramatist Mr. Planché. Its first performance was in April, 1826, and the success of the piece was enthusiastic. "The Fairy Queen words, was "indescribable." "When I entered the orchestra," he said in a letter to the Times newspaper, "the overture to 'Oberon' was in the house, which was filled to overflowing, rose up, and I was saluted by bursts and waving of hats and handkerchiefs, which I thought would never cease." The enthusiasm communicated on entering the house, and was interrupted twice or thrice with bursts of applause. So much for this night. The next day Weber hardly believed that he could ever sleep in peace till he had communicated to you this new blessing of Heaven." But this was a fleeting and hollow success. In a few nights the crowds deserted the house altogether, and Weber never had the mortification to see his opera performed almost to empty benches. On the 5th of June he was found dead in bed, in the house of Sir George Smart; and, when "Oberon" was performed, shortly afterwards for the benefit of his family, the receipts were barely sufficient to defray the expenses. The music, however, could is perhaps not so unaccountable as it may seem. The quality of the music admits of no question; but the piece, in a dramatic point of view, is far from attractive. It is written with the grace and elegance to be expected from Mr. Planché, but is unhappy in his subject, which is extravagantly fantastic and destitute of human interest. The hero and heroine, a knight and a princess, are under the special protection of Oberon, King of the Fairies, and are perpetually in every danger and difficulty by the blast of a magic horn, as in a child's fairy tale. The fairy scenes, however, cannot be made to act as the charms of music or the brilliancy of spectacle; and "Oberon" has never had any solid success, either in England or Germany. It may be occasionally revived, as it is now, for the temporary object of which we have spoken, but it will never become a stock piece.

Mr. Planché, the author of the drama, and Mr. Benedict, the director of the orchestra of HER MAJESTY'S Theatre (who was Weber's favourite pupil), have made many alterations in the performance. The version the poetical beauty of Mr. Planché's language is necessarily lost, but the task of translation has been done with much success. The dialogue is shortened, and some of the incidents, which tended only to perplex and incumber the plot, are omitted. Mr. Benedict has converted into recitative the whole of the spoken dialogue, which is carried on nearly without music; this being, as our musical readers know, an adaptation of the "Freischütz" system, which made a step in advance as dialogue simply spoken is entirely unknown. Mr. Benedict has done this with consummate skill and judgment, but still it is a change for the worse. The beauties of the concerted pieces in the original version are destroyed; and the substitution of a kind of recitative which the best composers have rendered tedious to the most harmonious singers, in scenes in which it is employed more slowly and heavily. The ease is different with the recitatives employed in monologues, or scenes of dialogue, as Weber always wrote the dialogue in recitative. Mr. Benedict has also introduced several pieces taken from another of Weber's operas, "Euryanthe," which are very beautiful, and which agree entirely with what is said by M. Planché in the preface to the libretto:—"The exceeding delicacy of his duty has been gravely felt by the writer of these lines, who has often had to regret that he hope that no difference of opinion will arise as to the degree of success with which he has endeavoured to adapt the English book to the music. He is convinced that all who know him will appreciate the spirit in which he has encountered them."

The music has been put upon the stage with a degree of splendour which we have seldom seen equalled, and its whole performance is admirable. Mdlle. Lagrua sustains the part of Rezia with much feeling, and she sings the music—some of which is of the most arduous kind—with immense vocal power, combined with the utmost beauty and brilliancy. Signor Mario's part of Huon is very short, but better still if his singing and acting were smoother and quieter. Alboni's execution of the music assigned to the fairy Fatima is perfect in perfection of finish and refinement; the comic character of Sheraseia is in every respect well sustained by Everardi; and Belart—though it is impossible for him, or any one else, to produce a being who is even ideal as the King of the Fairies—sings the music of the part very delicately. The choruses and concerted pieces are admirably executed, and decorations everything was excellent, and worthy of HER MAJESTY'S Theatre.

The last PHILHARMONIC CONCERT took place on Monday last, and closed the society's forty-eighth season with the utmost éclat. The programme included Mozart's symphony in D; Bennett's overture, "The Naiades;" Beethoven's symphony in C minor; Mozart's concerto in G minor, played by Miss Arabella Goddard; and two vocal pieces, sung by Miss Louisa Pyne. The season has been most prosperous.

The season of the MUSICAL UNION has also come to a close. The Directors have resolved to commence a series at St. James's Hall, when nearly eight hundred persons of the élite of fashionable society may be accommodated. Chamber music, Schubeck and Haüle, who, among other things, played Mozart's duet in C, a great treat, were in consummate performance. There were also Beethoven's chef-d'œuvre in chamber music, the trio in B flat, and Mendelssohn's trio in D minor, by Sainton and Mollie. Artot sang the grand air, "O prêtres de Baal," from the "Athalie" of Haydn. The season, due to the exertions of Mr. Ella, has been brilliant and successful in the extreme.

Mr. HOWARD GLOVER'S concert at St. James's Hall, on Thursday week was one of the most remarkable entertainments of the season. The bill of fare was of the richest kind, as Mr. Glover is a most recherché and gave employment to a host of our most eminent vocal and instrumental artists. The programme opened with a new overture was Mr. Glover's cantata, "Tam o' Shanter, a work full of original genius, which we predict deserves celebrity. On this occasion the solo part was sung by Mr. Sims Reeves with that perfection which is our great dramatic effect. The hall was crowded to the doors.

The Sacred Harmonic Subscription Concert of the VOCAL ASSOCIATION took place at St. James's Hall on Friday evening; the 20th ult., under the direction of Mr. Benedict. It was an entertainment of very high character. The first part consisted Macfarren's new cantata, "May-day," a work which does honour to the English school of composition, and which was admirably performed, the part of the May Queen being entrusted to Miss Dolby. Mendelssohn's beautiful "Ave Maria," from the posthumous opera of "Loreley," in which Miss Dolby also sang the "Cujus animam" from Rossini's Benedict's scena, "By him betrayed," from "Diego de Lara," sung by Mr. Sautley. Great interest was excited by the début of a young lady, named in the bill Enrichetta Camilla, who sang the fine scena, "Ancb' io, from Verdi's "Nabuco," with a charming voice, and the style and execution of a complete artist. She was encored, and was enthusiastically applauded. Though this young singer's name has not yet been made public, we may mention that she is a member of the talented family of Mr. T. P. Chipp, and has lately returned from Italy, where she has been pursuing her professional studies. The Vocal Association, under the able management of Mr. Benedict, appears to be in a flourishing condition.

THE THEATRES.

ST. JAMES'S.—M. Leclere has appeared in a new character—one familiar to the French stage—that of an old, faithful servant, who devotes his savings to the salvation of his master's family. The piece is entitled "Un Vieux de la vieille Roche." Fidelity is the only virtue of the old man; for in his servant's capacity he misdoes everything. Breaking and losing are his constant occupations; and the consequence is that he is intrusted with. No wonder that his new mistress is dissatisfied, and proceeds to discharge him. While the stupid old fellow, however, is weeping over his ill fortune she makes the discovery that her own brother has been the recipient of all he had to lend, and been saved from suicide by his bounty. This, of course, causes her to relent—nay, inspires her with gratitude to the maladroit domestic, who is therefore permitted to remain in the service of the house he loves. M. Leclere also performs in a second piece, "Les Amours de Cleopatre." The heroine is a grisette (Mdlle. Basin) attached to M. Gratelard (M. Leclere). The latter is there dismissed to put an end to his connection with her, preparatory to his marrying respectably. But Cleopatre has taken a different view of the matter. She is bent on becoming his wife, and adopts measures accordingly. She threatens, wheedles, affects madness, proposes suicide, and whatever else she conceives the probable means of inducing Gratelard to make her an honest woman. It is needless to say that she triumphs at last.

OLYMPIC.—On Monday the burlesque of "Shylock," having been performed previously for Mr. Robson's benefit, was permanently revived, with new scenery to correspond with the great satisfaction of the audience. The grosser portions of the burlesque have been altered or omitted, and Mr. Robson is replaced by Miss Rose of Venice. Mr. Robson's performance of Shylock has lost nothing of its force or point, and in regard to its finesse has received much improvement. The great attraction of the piece is Miss Swanborough, who is Gratiana and the admirers of genuine burlesque acting should avail themselves early of the opportunity of witnessing a performance that excites as much wonder as pleasure.

THE FRENCH ORPHEONISTS.

THE visit of the three thousand French Orpheonists to this country—viewed in its social and in its musical aspect (in both of which it is equally great)—has been duly recorded in the Illustrated Paper. On the next page of the present Number will be found an illustration of the grand festival in the Crystal Palace. The third performance of this remarkable body of choral singers, on Thursday week, was a great success. Nearly 17,000 persons were present, including the Duchess of Sutherland, Lord Palmerston, and Lord Lyndhurst. The programme included the favourite pieces, which were received with the usual enthusiastic applause; but indeed, the applause throughout was of a still-increasing character. At the conclusion there was the usual exceeding excitement, the enthusiasm of the previous Monday and Tuesday, if that were possible. After "God Save the Queen" had been given by the Frenchmen, a military band was placed in the centre of the orchestra, and all the galleries struck up "Partant pour la Syrie." This seemed to take our allies by surprise, and the exclamations of delight were loudly cheered. Such an expression of delight we have rarely witnessed, and, not to be outdone, they again gave out with lusty voices our National Anthem; and this was the first time the performance was entrusted to a band and chorus, and orchestra to audience—mingled with cheers and shouts, until we fancy a good many throats were not improved by the experience.

On Friday week the Sacred Harmonic Society gave a concert, selected entirely from the performances of the Orpheonists, at Exeter Hall, to which filled the spacious room, and appeared highly delighted with the entertainment.

On Saturday last there was a supplementary and farewell concert at the Crystal Palace. After the concert, which went off admirably, the Orpheonists to the number of 900 were entertained to a farewell banquet. The expenses were defrayed by subscription, the list of subscribers including many of our best-known and most influential public men. The dinner itself was an excellent one, and was served without any disorder. Subsequently a series of toasts were proposed and responded to. They included the healths of the Sovereigns of the two countries, and the Anglo-French alliance. Speeches were delivered by Mr. Hullah, who presided, Mr. Bright, Mr. Beckett-Denison, Mr. Locke, M.P.; and the Orpheonists, together with their more phlegmatic allies, gave vent to the heartiest enthusiasm. The banquet was a most successful one, and the 900 guests from the minds of our distinguished visitors the recollection of some of their less agreeable experiences.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

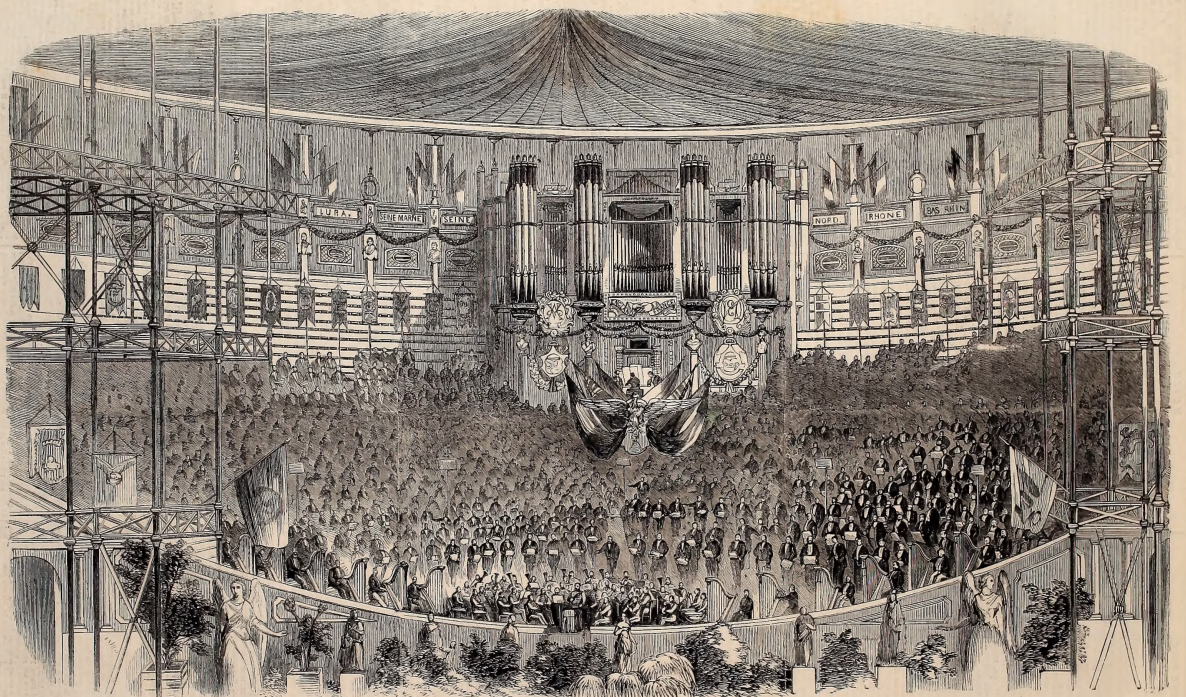
REAR-ADMIRAL Stopford has been appointed Captain of the Channel fleet, vice Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Pasley.

Vice-Admiral Hope Johnstone has been appointed Commander-in-Chief at the Nore, vice Admiral Harvey, whose term of service is just expired.

The Channel fleet arrived in Yarmouth Roads last Saturday. The squadron has been engaged in target-practice in the North Sea during the past week.

Six more gun-boats have been opened up at Haslar. Two of them, built by Messrs. Laird, are composite in their construction, but the others exhibit most serious defects.

A notice from the Commander-in-Chief's office states that the Military Secretary will receive ladies and gentlemen at half-past eleven o'clock on Tuesday next.



Sir Archdale Wilson, of Delhi fame, has been placed on the Field Establishment of General Officers of HER MAJESTY'S Indian Forces from the 31st of September.

The Duke of Wellington, as Colonel of the Victoria Rifles, gave a dinner to its members yesterday se'nnight at Apsley House. The Union Club and Willis's Rooms supplied the wines and a selection of favourite madrigals and glees.

The Commander-in-Chief has countermanded the order for the embarkation for India of the draughts of the first battalion of the 5th Fusiliers and 87th Regiment, as these regiments will probably return home before the ships are ready.

TESTING THE ARMSTRONG GUN.—In order to substantiate the extreme confidence which is reposed in it, and the highest possible charge of powder and shot, one of the 12-pounder guns recently turned out in the Woolwich Arsenal has been ordered to undergo additional proof for the satisfaction of the War Department and the country, was recently submitted to the following test:—A charge of 4lb. of powder and a ounce of powder which the charge was capable of containing, to which was added a 12-pound shot and a 6-pound shot, equivalent to 18lb. weight. This charge was repeated and fired in a dozen rounds, and after a careful searching of the bore and the application of the strongest lenses to test the solidity of the metal, the firing was continued, with the charge as above stated, up to twenty rounds, when the firing was ceased. Not one of the guns, having been again examined and subjected to ample scrutiny, was pronounced incapable of being burst or damaged under ordinary usage.

GYMNASTICS EXTRAORDINARY.—Galignani gives an account of some extraordinary gymnastic feats performed in Paris by M. Leotard. Springing up from a trapeze, he suddenly attached to another trapeze by his knees, raised himself by strength of arm until his body had completely overleaped, he was suspended by his knees, and his head touched the ground on a level below him. Still bearing on the wrists, he raised his feet in the air until the body formed a right angle with the arms, and then, by a sudden effort, all the body bent back until the feet had gone below the wrists, and, then executing a backward somersault, he alighted on the ground, and remained with the head still down, then turned his body as it had been at first, and dropped into the place where he had originally started. The difficulty of this feat consists not so much in the degree of strength required as in the necessity of not losing presence of mind in the midst of movements so rapid and only employing at the same time different sets of muscles, and in the instantaneous calculation of the precise moment at which the feet must touch the bar. Yet all this was effected with such ease, and such apparent facility, that it took a moment's reflection to remember that, a long ladder was placed at an ordinary angle against one of the rafters of the roof, and the performer, having mounted to the summit of it, descended to the centre of the side; and, having balanced himself there for a few seconds, he suddenly let go, and sought the bottom of the ladder by a somersault. Catching hold of the opposite side, he repeated the same feat which he had come, he had to let go his hold, and, turning in the air, to seize the ladder with his feet, and to descend in the same manner as before. Then, as if he had not performed enough, he again let go, and turning another somersault, he alighted on the platform which he had stood on at first.

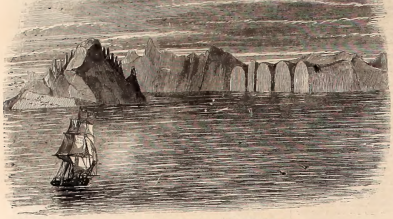
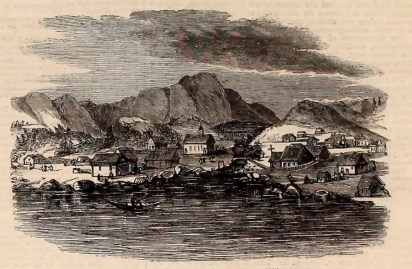
THE NORTH ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

THE desirability of electric communication between Europe and America, more particularly between England, Canada, and the United States, is very evident; and the possibility of the existence of such communication is no longer matter of conjecture. The causes of the comparative failure of the line from Valentia to Newfoundland in 1858 are not as yet perfectly known; but it is probable that what is termed the "retardation" of the electric current has much to do with it. It has been found that in one-third of a second an impression can be conveyed for a distance of 500 miles, while to accomplish 1000 miles a whole second is required; and through a perfectly insulated line of 2000 miles in length the electric fluid takes nine seconds to pass. The wire in that last case becomes, like a Leyden jar, charged with electricity to so great a degree that some almost mechanical force has to be employed to remove it. Doubtless, in time, instruments will be invented whose delicacy and exactness will be such that they will be able to propel, as it were, this force to any distance, and under any circumstances. At present, however, the world waits for the connecting link which is to bind even more closely the two continents already united by so many ties.



The great desire which the people have to connect the two hemispheres by an electric communication has been the cause of the approbation given to the northern route so recently presented by Colonel Tal. P. Shaffner, of the United States, whose plans are highly matured, and who waits only for the detailed survey to place the line in course of construction.

Bearing in mind what has been stated with regard to "retardation," he has chosen a route which, whatever its disadvantage, offers the manifest advantage of breaks in the passage of the current of electricity. The total length of cable to be laid under water will be about 1725 miles, and this he proposes to divide it into lengths, the greatest of which shall not exceed 600 miles. The route intended to be followed will be best illustrated by the accompanying Map, in which the general direction of the cable is shown.



It will be seen from this that the proposed starting-point is in the north of Scotland, a district which affords many deep and safe harbours; that then the line passes to Thorshaven, the chief town of the Faroe Isles. It again is continued from Westermanshaven, also on the Island of Stromoe, to Portland, and thence to Reijkiavik, the capital of Iceland. From Reijkiavik it is to be laid to some point on the south coast of Greenland, south of latitude 61 deg. north. The line is to continue across Greenland, in the district of Julianshaab; then to be laid again under water to an inlet on the coast of Labrador, called Hamilton's Inlet. The distance from Scotland to the Faroe Isles is calculated to be 225 miles; from the Faroe Isles to Iceland, 300 miles; from Iceland to Greenland, 600 miles; and from Greenland to Hamilton's Inlet, 600 miles.

Deep-sea soundings have been taken by Colonel Shaffner in such parts of the ocean as the line is likely to traverse, and it is hoped that it will be laid throughout its whole length on a bed of mud and sand, not shifting or moved by under currents, but fixed and gradually receiving in those parts of the sea between Iceland, Greenland, and Labrador additions from the sand dropped to the bottom because of the dissolving of icebergs. From the north of Scotland to Iceland the sea is nowhere deeper than 1000 fathoms. From Iceland to Greenland the ocean bed gradually sinks to a depth of about 1540 fathoms, and then again shelves upwards; and between Greenland and Labrador the depth is nowhere more than 2090 fathoms, the greatest depth being almost under the region of the great Spitsbergen current.

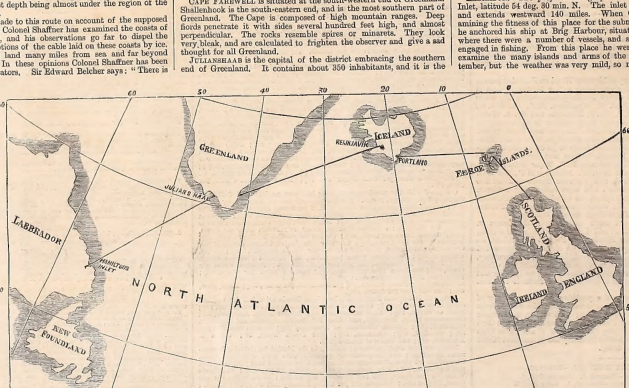
Objections have been made to this route on account of the supposed danger from icebergs, but Colonel Shaffner has examined the coasts of Labrador and Greenland, and his observations go far to dispel the apprehensions of interruptions of the cable laid on these coasts by ice. Deep fiords penetrate the land many miles from sea, and far beyond the reach of icebergs. In these opinions Colonel Shaffner has been sustained by Arctic navigators. Sir Edward Belcher says: "There is but little known with regard to the size of the base of an iceberg or their extension under water, but above water they rise from 20 to 40 or 80 feet, and the largest or pinnacle bergs rarely exceed 110 feet in height."

The advantages of this route are—first, the circuits are short, and the cable can be worked with commercial celerity; secondly, in case any part of a section should get damaged, the whole will not be lost, and the injured cable can be repaired.

The promoters of this enterprise, through a deputation to Lord Palmerston, requested the English Government to take the soundings of the seas on the proposed route, and for this service the war-ship Bulldog has been dispatched, under the command of Sir Leopold F. M'Clintock. The sea of the whole route will be sounded on the outward and homeward voyages. Besides the Government expedition the Fox has been purchased, and will shortly sail, under the command of Captain Allen Young, to survey the coasts and landing-places for the cables. Experienced gentlemen go with the Fox to determine the land route.

The concession for the Danish territories on the proposed route was obtained by Colonel Shaffner in 1854, and since then he has been energetically advocating the practicability of the enterprise for commercial telegraphy. With a view of ascertaining the physics, so far as pertained to the laying of the cable, he chartered a barque of some 200 tons, and sailed from Boston on the 29th of August, 1859, for Labrador, Greenland, and the Northern Seas, accompanied by his family and a few friends. This preliminary survey was one of importance. The practicability of laying the cable, particularly with reference to Greenland and Labrador, was ascertained, and increased confidence is now entertained in the early realisation of the projected means of electric communication between the Old and the New Worlds.



THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

CAPE FAREWELL is situated at the south-western end of Greenland. Shallenhook is the south-eastern end, and is the most southern part of Greenland. The Cape is composed of high mountain ranges. Deep fiords penetrate it with sides several hundred feet high, and almost perpendicular. The rocks resemble spires or minarets. They look very bleak, and are calculated to frighten the observer and give a sad thought for all Greenland.

JULIANSHAAB is the capital of the district embracing the southern end of Greenland. It contains about 350 inhabitants, and it is the residence of the Governor. It has a very good church, with an organ, and some very fine paintings. A courthouse has been recently erected, though there is but little use for a court of justice, and the building is principally for a place of keeping the records. On the completion of the telegraph it is expected to be made the capital of all Greenland. The town is situated on a small bay of a wide fiord, about ten miles from the sea. It is surrounded by very high mountains, which protect it from the northern winds. A fresh-water lake supplies it with water and salmon. The houses of the whites are of stone, mostly covered with slate. Double windows are not required. The Esquimaux mostly live in stone huts, covered with earth. A graveyard is at the western end of the town. The burial of the Esquimaux formerly was by inclosing the body in scalskins, and laying it upon some high hill, and covering it with stones. They now bury the dead in the earth and mark the spot with chaste stone slabs. There is a school at this place, and the Esquimaux are taught to read, write, and to praise their God the same as Europeans.

LABRADOR.—The projected telegraph is to be laid into Hamilton's Inlet, latitude 54 deg. 30 min. N. The inlet is about 30 miles wide, and extends westward 140 miles. When Colonel Shaffner was examining the fitness of this place for the submerging of the telegraph, he anchored his ship at Brig Harbour, situated on the northern side, where there were a number of vessels, and some two hundred people engaged in fishing. From this place he went from time to time to examine the many islands and arms of the sea. It was late in September, but the weather was very mild, so much so, in fact, that at night a brush tent served as a sufficient shelter.

KAKSIMUT is situated on the west coast of Greenland, about forty miles north of Juliashaab. It was at this place that Colonel Shaffner anchored his vessel, and there, in the Esquimaux umiaks, examined the bays or fiords. This place is near the open sea, and has about fifty inhabitants. It is a dépôt for the Greenland Company. When the vessel entered from the sea, it was accompanied by many of the Esquimaux in their umiaks (women's boat) and kajaks.

PROPOSED ROUTE OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

THE GROSVENOR HOTEL, PIMLICO.

THIS hotel, now being rapidly erected on the site of the old Grosvenor Basin in Belgravia, forms an integral part of the new Westend railway terminus, or Victoria station — the most comprehensive plan yet devised for the relief of London traffic. Few months concentrate themselves upon this spot, diverting from London-bridge and its choked approaches perhaps one half of the railway-travelling public, and creating a grand western centre immediately under the walls of Buckingham Palace. The multitudes of visitors bound west of Temple-bar to all the region of the parks and squares, Belgravia, Pimlico, and Westminster, will radiate hence directly to their destinations, avoiding altogether the tedious and perilous passes of the City. The Brighton, South-Eastern, Chatham and Dover, and Crystal Palace lines will bring in the circulation from the Continent, the south of England, and all the southern suburbs; while the Great-Western and North-Western Railways will draw from the rest of the empire, and even—via Liverpool and Milford Haven—from America. As a sieve to this enormous traffic, the Grosvenor Hotel is being placed at its embouchure. It occupies an area of three hundred feet long by fifty feet wide, and will contain eighty-four rooms, ten staircases, and a frontage of six hundred apartments—halls, corridors, lobbies, and closets. Of these more than two hundred are bedrooms and dressing-rooms, fifty are spare than two hundred are bedrooms and dressing-rooms, fifty are public rooms and rooms for the service of the hotel, twenty-six are private dining and drawing rooms, and one hundred and twenty are kitchens, scullery-rooms, and closets.

The foundations of the building are sunk through a series of quicksands, mudbanks, and old peat-bogs, to the solid mass of the London clay. The excavations threw an interesting light on the primeval geography of the Thames at this point of its course, but yielded no relics of archæological interest.

The height of the building will be upwards of one hundred feet from the pavement, but a lining-room and mansard entrances will diminish this externally to zero, and suggest to the sufferers from Parisian ennui a possible mode of uniting moderate room-rest with comfort. Architecturally the building will be a novel sight of its kind in Europe or at home. The architecture of the building externally is almost entirely of stone and white brick, as regards design and construction, and will speak for itself more clearly than drawings can speak for it. Our Engraving is taken from a large perspective drawing in the exhibition of the Royal Academy, and from it, reduced size, necessarily omits much decorative detail.

The building is to be completed in the autumn of next year. The architect is Mr. Knowles, of Gray's-inn, and the contractor Mr. Kelk of South-street, Grosvenor-square.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Liverpool three-days' meeting commences on Monday next, and Dundee, East Shanley, and Sunlight are in the Mersey Stakes of that day. The Two-year-old Plate is a new feature of the Cup Day, and Vancouver, Dundee, Lapin, Dundee, and Sunlight are mentioned among its forty entries. Lapin has been a good favourite for the Cup, but the speculation on this race has been comparatively quiet. After he had won at Newcastle, the St. Leger on Wednesday looks as if it were mortgaged to Wildman, who has Northern Light (5th, extra) among his engagements. The jockey in which Mr. Bethell's Saltram entered away from his field for the Queen's Plate there has brought him into notice for the Doncaster St. Leger, but Saltram's performance is backed freely at latter to one. Buccaneer and St. Albans seem likely to be good steady favourites; and as thousands still persist that The Wizard can run a strong-running race, we suppose that the exhibition of Engraving is taken from a large perspective drawing in the exhibition of the Royal Academy, and from it, reduced size, necessarily omits much decorative detail.

Fisherman and Sunlight, at three times to the Ascot Cup, are not we do not hear that they have accepted the offer. Dictator beat Walleon (who cannot stay beyond half a mile) very cleverly for the duly Stakes at Goodwood. St. Lager outsider, Augustus, was last year the four-year-old Stellaite (who only gave him 4 lb. in the Stanmore Plate.

The Summer Pigeon Handicap at Romney Wood on Saturday proved a most exciting affair. The day was nearly as fine for the purpose as Mr. Hutchinson could desire, and of the 150 entered upwards of fifty came to the scratch. Captain the Hon. F. Wyndham, M.P., the Hon. G. Craven, the Hon. Berkeley Craven, M.P., R. Hanbury, and Mr. A. Wilson killed their six birds, and eventually they finished in this order, the third and fourth named agreeing to divide the third and fourth prize. It was impossible to separate them, as they were shot into birds quite without a miss in the final ties, and seemed likely to go on at this destructive rate till evening. Captain de Barbier's Handicap finished. Of the other competitors, the Hon. G. Heathcote, M.P., Major Fellowes, Mr. Dawson Damer, M.P., Colonel the Hon. H. Annesley, M.P., the Hon. J. Craven, Mr. Hall of Aylesford, and Viscount Bernard killed five each. One or two of Mr. Damer's hits were remarkably brilliant. Five of the ties were decided by shots, seven birds each having killed two, six killed one, and the six unfortunates included Sir Thomas Mostyn, who is really one of the finest shots of the day.

The cricket matches for next week comprise the Gentlemen v. Players, on Monday; the M. C. C. and Ground v. South Wales Club, on Thursday; and the Forest Rangers v. Harrow Chequers, on Friday—at Lord's. The Oval fixtures are, on Monday, Gentlemen of Surrey Club v. Gentlemen of Midland Counties; and, on Thursday, Gentlemen of Kent v. Gentlemen of the South of Kent rests from its labours that week to enjoy the Royal Show; and, on Monday and Tuesday, the Gentlemen of Berkshire v. Gentlemen of the town at Reading.

Every day of next week boasts of a yachting or rowing fixture of importance to say nothing of minor events:—On Monday we have the Irish Model Yacht Club Challenge Cup; on Tuesday, the Leander Club Sculls; on Wednesday and Thursday, the R.T.Y.C. George Club Regatta, Kingstown; while on Friday the Prince of Wales Yacht Club and the Wellington Yacht Club, and on Saturday the Birkenhead Model Yacht Club, will also be up and doing.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANO-FORTE, price fifty Guineas.—This instrument has (unlike the cottage pianoforte) a compass of six octaves, and is of the same compass of tone as the Grand Pianoforte. The object has been to combine the greatest amount of power, and to stand perfectly in tune with the least amount of cost. The touch is responsive, the tone is round, full, and rich; and the power equal to that of a Grand Pianoforte. The case is of solid walnut wood, the top and wood; the touch elastic, and its repetition very rapid. Every possible improvement has been introduced in the action, and the whole of Chappell and Co.'s long experience has been brought to bear in its production, and manufacture, to the Foreign Model, feeling assured that it is Pianoforte of the highest excellence that can be produced in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and the full compass of 6½ octaves, with trichord throughout, may be had for fifty guineas.
CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

HARMONIUMS at CHAPPELL'S.—The HARMONIUM by ALEXANDRE is the only instrument of the kind that possesses the power of musical expression. Its construction is but slightly affected by changes of weather, and is alike applicable for the Church, Chapel, Concert-room, or Drawing-room.
No. 1. In oak case, one stop, 3 octaves, 12 guineas.
No. 2. In oak case, two stops, 3 octaves, 16 guineas.
No. 3. In oak case, two stops, 4 octaves, 16 guineas.
4. With five stops—as, 2 octaves, 24 guineas.
5. Eight stops, 4 octaves, 30 guineas.
6. Twelve stops—oak or rosewood, 35 guineas.
7. Fifteen stops—oak or rosewood, 40 guineas.
8. Three stops, and pedals—oak or rosewood, 45 guineas.
9. Eight stops, percussion action, oak or rosewood, 55 guineas.
10. Twelve stops, percussion action, in handsome case, 65 guineas.
11. Twelve stops, percussion action, large size, in rosewood, 45 guineas.
12. The new model—18 stops, percussion action, expressive, 4 octaves, 8 in suite, &c.; the most perfect Harmonium that can be made, in handsome oak or rosewood case, 65 guineas.

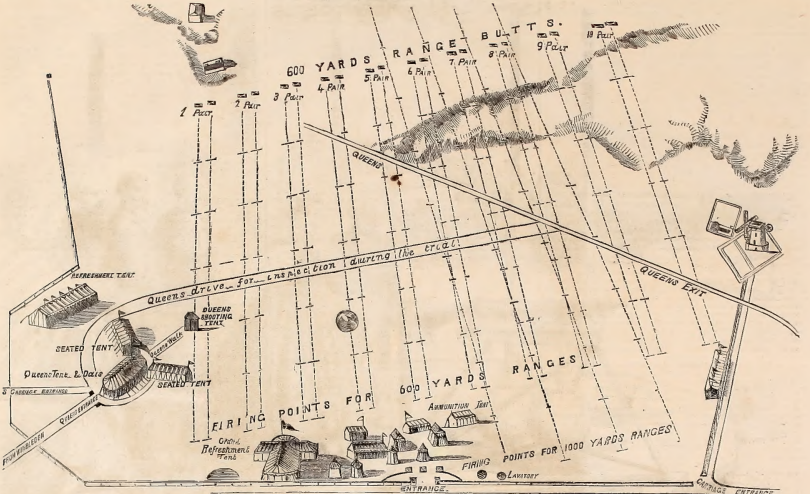
THE GREAT RIFLE-SHOOTING MATCH ON WIMBLEDON COMMON.—HER MAJESTY FIRING THE FIRST SHOT.

THE NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION.



INAUGURATION BY HER MAJESTY OF THE FIRST PRIZE MEETING.

THE first great trial of skill amongst the members of this association took place on Monday on Wimbledon Common, her Majesty the Queen inaugurating the meeting by firing the first shot from a Whitworth rifle at a range of 400 yards. The fineness of the day attracted a vast number of persons to the spot, and at an early hour in the afternoon the inclosure was well filled with company, who in the vicinity of the Queen's marquee increased to a dense crowd. There was a considerable attendance of ladies of distinction.

There were ten pairs of targets on the ground, each pair supported by a butt of earth, the latter divided by a space of eighty yards. The ranges varied from 200 to 1000 yards. At the lesser distances the targets are six feet by two feet, with a bull's-eye of eight inches; and at the greater ranges the targets are six feet square, with a two-feet centre and no bull's-eye. The following code of signals has been adopted:—When a bull's-eye is hit, a red and white flag is shown and three points are scored; when a centre is hit, a dark blue flag is shown, and two points are scored; when an outer—that is, the target outside the centre—is struck, a white flag is shown, and one point is scored.

Previously to the arrival of her Majesty the various competitors of the day were drawn up in line in the vicinity of the Royal marquee, the ground between which and the Queen's shooting-tent was lined, at short intervals, by a deputation of some sixty Swiss riflemen, twenty of whom have come over from their native valleys to compete for the prizes offered by the association, the remainder being residents in London, but proficients in the use of their national weapon.

Shortly before four o'clock his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, accompanied by Colonel the Hon. James Macdonald, arrived, having driven from town in an open phaeton and pair. Her Majesty reached the ground shortly before four o'clock. The Royal party occupied seven of the Queen's carriages, and were escorted by a detachment of the 10th Hussars. Her Majesty was received on alighting by the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, M.P., Earl Spencer, Lord Elcho, the Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., and Captain E. St. John Mildmay, by whom the illustrious party were conducted through the Royal marquee to the dais overlooking the practice-ground.

The Queen, on presenting herself to the assembled visitors within the lines, was received with loud cheers, which her Majesty graciously acknowledged. Advancing to the front of the dais, the Royal group for a few moments surveyed with apparent interest the arrangements of the ground and the position of the several butts, the different ranges of which were explained by Captain Mildmay.

The formal business of the day commenced with the presentation of an address from the members of the association to her Majesty, which was read by the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, M.P., Secretary for War.

The Queen listened to the address with marked attention, and, at its conclusion, read, with a clear and distinct voice, the following reply:—

"I receive with sincere satisfaction the sentiments of attachment to my throne, person, and family, which have been expressed by the President and Council of your Association; and I assure you that I, together with my Royal Consort, have gladly given encouragement to a body whose object it is to render permanent an armed force limited exclusively to defensive purposes, and founded upon voluntary exertions.

I have witnessed with pleasure the manner in which the ancient fondness of the English people for manly and sylvan sports has been converted by your association to more important ends, and has been made an auxiliary instrument for maintaining inviolable the safety of our common country.

The Secretary for War next read an address to the Prince Consort, to which his Royal Highness made the following reply:—

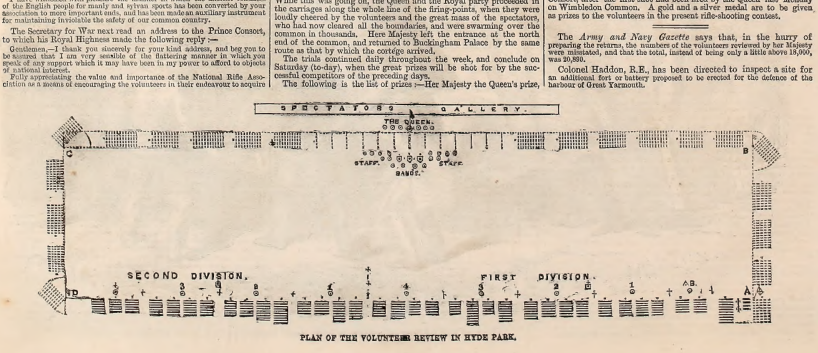
Gentlemen,—I thank you sincerely for your kind address, and beg you to be assured that I am very sensible of the flattering manner in which you speak of my support which it may have been in my power to afford to objects of national interest.

Fully appreciating the value and importance of the National Rifle Association as a means of encouraging the volunteers in their endeavour to acquire that skill in the use of their weapon on which their whole efficiency depends, I with peculiar pleasure that I have accepted your invitation to become its patron; nor can I doubt, when I look around me and see the manner in which the call of the council has been responded to, that the result will answer the most sanguine expectations of those who set the present movement on foot.

In establishing a prize open to the competition of all nations my object was to give our British marksmen an opportunity of comparing their own arms and their own skill with those of other countries. And I am convinced the result will be to show that as the British manufacturer is already second to none in the fabrication of the arm itself, so the people of this country are not to be surpassed by any in the knowledge how to use it.

This ceremonial completed, her Majesty and the Royal party were conducted from the reception-marquee along a raised platform, covered with crimson cloth, to the Royal shooting-tent, where Mr. Whitworth was presented to the Queen, and had the honour of explaining the mode in which her Majesty was to fire the first shot from one of his own rifles. A piece of scarlet cord attached to the trigger was handed to the Queen, who gently pulled it, and the Royal rifle-shot was fired. In an instant the red and white flag was shown by the marker, and "three points" were scored to the Queen of England. Loud cheering followed, as her Majesty declared the prize meeting opened, and a salute of twenty-one guns announced the fact to the thousands who did not hear the few words spoken by her Majesty. A messenger from the butt arrived in a few moments with the diagram showing the exact spot struck by the bullet. It was exactly on the vertical line drawn through the centre of the bull's-eye, and one inch above the horizontal line. The bull's-eye is eight inches in diameter, and a line drawn vertically, and another horizontally, intersect exactly in the centre. The Queen's bullet hit at an inch above this point of intersection, but upon the vertical line. It was at the centre of the bull's-eye on one line, but an inch above the centre on the other. The distance of the butt was 400 yards—the same as that which, the old ballad says, Cloudesle shot at with his bow; and the bullet fired from the rest from the Whitworth rifle struck on the vertical line, just as the arrow from the old bowman cleft the hazel rod which he struck up as a mark. The Royal party retraced their steps to the pavilion, and proceeded to examine a selection of guns and rifles of modern invention which were exhibited in an adjoining marquee. The firing parties then took up their position, and the shooting at 300 yards range commenced. While this was going on, the Queen and the Royal party proceeded in the carriages along the whole line of the firing-points, when they were loudly cheered by the volunteers and the great mass of the spectators, who had now cleared all the boundaries, and were swarming over the common in thousands. Here Majesty left the entrance at the north of the common, and returned to Buckingham Palace by the same route as that by which the cortège arrived.

The trials continued daily throughout the week, and conclude on Saturday (to-day), when the great prizes will be shot for by the successful competitors of the preceding days.



The following is the list of prizes:—Her Majesty the Queen's prize, £250; his Royal Highness the Prince Consort's prize, £100; his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge's prize, £50. Given by the association:—The gold medal; the silver medal; twenty Whitworth rifles (value each twenty-five guineas), £500; twenty prizes, of the value of £750. Volunteer Ball prizes, given by Mr. Gye, of the Royal Italian Opera:—1st, £100; ditto, 2nd, £25; ditto, 3rd, £25; ditto, 4th, £25; ditto, 5th, £25; Duke of Wellington's prize, £50; Ladies of Northamptonshire, £35; London Rifle Brigade cup, value £50; Army and Navy Gazette prize, £20; one rifle presented by Lord Vernon; three rifles presented by Messrs. Westley Richards, of Birmingham; three rifles presented by Messrs. Lancaster, of Bond-street, London; one rifle presented by Messrs. Smith, of Davies-street, London; one rifle presented by Messrs. Egan, of Hustlergate, Bradford; one rifle presented by Messrs. Turner, of Birmingham; and one rifle presented by the riflemen of Switzerland.

THE NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION'S MEDAL.

This medal—of which we give an Engraving, the exact size of the original, on page 20—was executed by Mr. G. G. Adams, the artist, who obtained the £100 prize for the jurors' medal of the Great Exhibition of 1851, and who also executed the medal presented to her Majesty and the Prince Consort at the opening of the Sydenham Crystal Palace, the Chancellor's medal (Cambridge), and several other meritorious works of a similar kind. The medal has been greatly admired both for its design and execution. On the obverse are two figures—one of which represents an English archer of the olden time, from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century; and the other a rifleman of the present period, armed with his still deadlier weapon. The use of the longbow and the clothyard-shaft was once the pastime of the English people, and the terror of England's foes; and it is the hope of the National Rifle Association, by establishing rifle-shooting as a national pastime, to make the rifle what the bow was in the days of the Plantagenets, the familiar weapon of those who stand forth in the defence of their country. Beneath the base line are the words "Sit perpetuum." The reverse has a wreath of bays, within which is the inscription "National Rifle Association." Two of these medals, in gold, were presented by Lord Elcho to her Majesty and the Prince Consort, after the first shot had been fired by the Queen last Monday on Wimbledon Common. A gold and a silver medal are to be given as prizes to the volunteers in the present rifle-shooting contest.

The Army and Navy Gazette says that, in the hurry of preparing the returns, the numbers of the volunteers reviewed by her Majesty were misstated, and that the total, instead of being only a little above 18,000, was 20,880.

Colonel Haddon, R.E., has been directed to inspect a site for an additional fort or battery proposed to be erected for the defence of the harbour of Great Yarmouth.

PLAN OF THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW IN HYDE PARK.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

A MORNING sitting in the House of Commons has at all times an unsatisfactory appearance. That queer chamber—which seems as if it had been constructed by a Chinese architect, who, having attempted to engraft English medieval ornamentation on his native style, has by consequence produced a result which can only be likened to a view in a kaleidoscope suddenly made right—was primarily intended for night sittings. When, therefore, it is used by daylight it has a flavour of Vauxhall when visited at noon—a simile which few of the present generation are probably able to appreciate. The Orpheonists, no doubt, saw many things during their visit to the metropolis which astonished them; but we will take it on us to say that never under any circumstances did any party of them experience such utter bewilderment as when conducted to a morning sitting of our representative assembly. When their blank amazement at beholding the oddest room in the world had subsided, and their attention was turned to the floor of the House, the first person they saw was the solemn gentleman who sat keeping watch and ward over the strangers could preserve them in a state of quietude. The exclamatory bursts of surprise, the continued rising from their seats, the craning of necks, and the general hubbub with the immediate development of the bob perukes of the clerks at the table, could not be restrained; and when the Speaker left the chair empty, on the House going into Committee, it was evident that their presence could not have been removed to the custody of Dr. Fehrer thought that he had counted out the wisdom of leaving the clerks at liberty until the next, there were a perfect mutiny. Indeed, the Orpheonists, no doubt, were a palpable symptoms of exhaustion among members. That it is they speak abundantly and constantly; but the Houses have been thin, and the "counts out" and attempts at "counting out" frequent. The overhauling of the estimates has undoubtedly to be attributed to the main subject of discussion having been India. It is a trite and well-worn observation that few members attend it is the trite and well-worn observation that few members attend it is the trite and well-worn observation that few members attend it is the INAUGURATION OF THE BUST OF SIR J. PAKINGTON, HASLAR HOSPITAL MUSEUM.

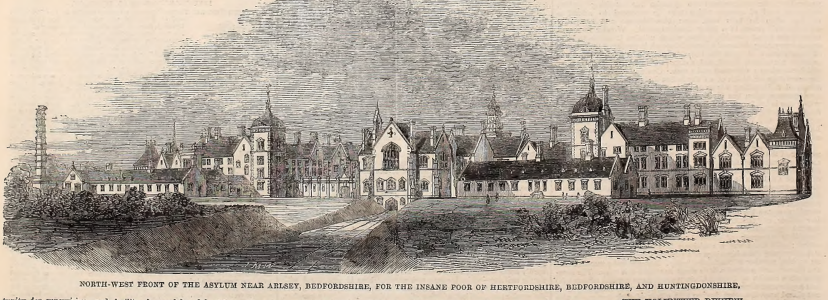
THE bust of the Right Hon. Sir John Pakington, Bart., G.C.B., executed by Baron Marochetti, was placed in Haslar Hospital Museum on the 5th ult., by a deputation of the medical officers of the Royal Navy, in acknowledgment of the eminent services rendered to the medical department of the service by the Right Hon. Baronet during his administration as First Lord of the Admiralty. The deputation—consisting of Dr. Dobie, R.N., Dr. Ross, Deputy Inspector-General; Dr. Nelson, R.N.; Dr. Beith, R.N.; and Dr. M'William, R.N.—was, with Baron Marochetti, introduced by the Hon. Geo. Hastings, C.B., the Captain Superintendent, by Dr. Nisbet, the Medical Inspector-General of Haslar Hospital. There were nearly one hundred persons present, including (besides those mentioned) the medical officers of the hospital and their families, several families in the neighbourhood, and the medical officers of her Majesty's ships in the port and at Spithead. Dr. M'William delivered an address on the occasion, which was appropriately responded to by Captain Hastings. Dr. Dobie, having thanked the Captain Superintendent for his presence on the occasion, hoped that he would convey to the Admiralty the earnest acknowledgments of the deputation for the prompt and courteous manner in which their Lordships had acceded to the request of the deputation to place the bust in Haslar Hospital.

The bust, which is of marble, and alike admirable as a work of art and as a striking representation of the right hon. Baronet, rests upon a pedestal of red granite, upon which the following inscription is engraved:—"This bust of the Right Hon. Sir John S. Pakington, Bart., G.C.B., is placed in Haslar Hospital by the medical officers of the Royal Navy, to record their sense of the benefits conferred upon that department of her Majesty's service during his administration as First Lord of the Admiralty in 1858-9."

A duplicate of this bust was presented to Lady Pakington on Wednesday, June 13, at the family residence in Eaton-square; and after the presentation a large party, including the deputation, partook of luncheon with Sir John and her Ladyship.

BUST OF THE RIGHT HON. SIR J. PAKINGTON, BART., M.P., RECENTLY PLACED IN THE MUSEUM OF THE ROYAL NAVAL HOSPITAL, HASLAR.

THE THREE COUNTIES ASYLUM FOR INSANE POOR, NEAR ARLSEY, BEDFORDSHIRE.



THIS establishment, opened in March last for the reception of 594 lunatic patients of Hertfordshire, Bedfordshire, and Huntingdonshire, has more than a common interest attached to its history, not only on account of its being one of the last built, but also because the above-named counties already possessed an asylum near the town of Bedford for criminal and pauper lunatics. In 1852 the then committee of visitors contemplated enlarging the asylum, but were advised to seek another and much more extended site. The result was the purchase of 257 acres of land, in the parish of Stotfold, near Baldock. The estate lies high, and commands a view of the surrounding country and of the Great Northern Railway as it runs past the Arlsey station, about four miles north of Hitchin. The building from this point presents to the traveller a good idea of its magnitude and character. It is constructed of white brick, relieved by fretwork, cornices, mouldings, &c., of different coloured bricks, giving a very pleasing appearance without much extra cost.

It may here be remarked that in the preparation of the certain main objects dictated by practical example were kept in prospect, and in harmony with that freedom of communication, opportunity for supervision, and facility for useful and healthy employment found, by the test of considerable experience, to be indispensable for the great bulk of insane persons. Hence a sufficient reason for all the day and dining rooms and corridors being planned to be on the ground floor, to afford the motley-minded inhabitants a ready access to the pleasure-grounds, garden, and farm, as well also to the several workshops, the kitchen and offices, the laundry, washhouses, drying-rooms, &c., in order that all whose morbid questions, mental absorption, imaginary inability, or delusive beliefs render it imperative that they should at least be witnesses of, if not at first sharers in, the varied occupations necessarily belonging to an institution of such large dimensions. In no less salutary degree do those busy and natural employments operate on the restless, turbulent, destructive, obstinate, and violent patients.

Mr. Samuel Hall, of the North and East Ridings Asylum, was consulted by the magistrates upon all these matters. The acting architect, Mr. George Fowler Jones, of York, has most ably superintended the erection of the building, the whole works of which have been admirably executed by Mr. William Webster, the contractor, formerly of Boston, and now of Blackheath. Mr. William Deane, who was the medical superintendent of the old asylum at Bedford, fills the same office at the new asylum.

A chaplain's house has been provided, besides one for the steward and bailiff, as well as an entrance-lodge and six cottages for the families of married attendants. The day and dining rooms and corridors readily admit of being turned into recreation-halls, wherein varied amusements suitable to the diversified inclinations of the inmates can be enjoyed without confusion.

The chapel, the windows of which are seen in the central north block, is handsome and commodious, the approaches to it being by covered passages. The warming is by open fires. Behind each fireplace is an air-chamber supplied through glazed pipes with pure air, which, when warmed, escapes in wherever it is required. The ventilation is effected by means of similar channels built into the window-piers and chimney-stacks—those in the piers open into the roof; those in the chimney-stacks rise above the roof-ridge and end by horizontal openings. Within the roof, near the ridge, each stack or pump-shaft, as it may be termed, has an opening for carrying off the used air brought up by the pier-shafts.

STEAM-GONDOLA ON CONISTON LAKE.

WE this week present our readers with an Engraving of a most elegant and novel description of vessel, built for the especial gratification of tourists to our beautiful English lakes. This vessel is in its outward form and internal fittings a perfected combination of the Venetian gondola and the English steam-yacht—having the elegance, comfort, and speed of the latter, and the graceful lightness and quiet gliding motion of the former. It may be said to be the most elegant little steam-vessel yet designed, and is especially suitable for pleasure excursions on lake or river.

The Gondola, as it is named, now floats on Coniston Water, Lancashire, one of the most charming of our lakes, recently made easily accessible to tourists from the metropolis and the chief towns by the extension of the Furness Railway to within a short distance of the head of the lake.

The vessel is of iron or rather steel plates. It is 85 feet long, beam 14 feet, draught of water only 4 feet 6 in. and one foot forward. It is propelled by a screw driven by a 15-horse-power engine on the locomotive plan, burning coke, and placed quite aft, thus having the best part of the vessel for passengers, and relieving them from smoke, smell, and noise—two disagreeables generally complained of in ordinary steam-vessels. The speed of the Gondola is from ten to twelve miles an hour.

The centre of the vessel, being thus left free for passengers, is fitted up as a saloon, covered with a light roof; the sides, of plate-glass, in large sheets, affording an uninterrupted view of the magnificent scenery surrounding the lake, the summit of the highest mountains being visible to those seated in the saloon. The interior is beautifully finished in walnut wood, and is cushioned and decorated after the style of the Royal carriages of our railways. The prow, which is long and graceful, is adorned with a well-executed carving of the arms of the Duke of Devonshire, while the armorial bearings of the Duke of Buccleuch ornament the stern.

The vessel is the property of certain noblemen and gentlemen associated with the Furness Railway. It has been built to convey tourists round the lake, at intervals during the day, and for the use of private pleasure parties at other times.

The Gondola was designed by Mr. James Ramsden, the secretary and general manager of the Furness Railway: it was built by Messrs. Jones and Co., of Liverpool, under the inspection of Mr. Douglas Hebson. Very great credit is due to Mr. Ramsden for the novelty of the design and for the tasteful manner in which all the details have been completed. The design has been patented. The Gondola is commanded by one of those intrepid men who formed the crew of Sir Leopold M'Clintock in the recent voyage of the Fox to the Arctic regions.

THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW.

THE following account of the arrangements of the volunteer corps on the great review day in Hyde Park will form a suitable pendant to the plan engraved on page 18, for which we are indebted to Mr. G. Hanson, Volunteer Sergeant of the 1st Gloucestershire Artillery:—The volunteers were formed in a line of battalions, in contiguous columns at quarter distance, varying from 400 to 900 strong; four battalions forming a brigade, with the exception of the Artillery, which consisted of two battalions only. The whole mass or line was formed into two grand divisions, the first being the largest, embracing, in addition to four battalions (the strength of the second division), the Artillery Brigade, and the single battalion on the extreme right, composed of Mounted Rifles, the Hon. Artillery Company, Engineers, and Artists. After the Queen had passed down the line, during which the men presented arms, preparations were made for marching past—the first movement being "Fours, right," when each company formed four deep, and turned to the right face: "Quick march" being given, they moved forward, and when the last man of the front rank of each battalion had reached the first flagstaff, A, the order "Front, turn," was given, when they moved forward at quarter-distance column, at right angles to the original line, in the direction of the second flag at B, on reaching which the orders were, "The column will wheel to the left," "Left wheel, double," and round went the column in "double-quick" time, when square "Forward, quick," brought them parallel to the original line, marching in quick time, still at "quarter distance." However, before reaching this centre of the line, where the Queen was stationed, each battalion opened out to wheeling distance, or, in other words, to open-distance column, and thus they marched past her Majesty at a distance of twenty-five paces from each other, the three bands of the Household Brigade playing alternately during the marching past. After each battalion had passed a short distance from the Queen the order to form once more quarter-distance column was given, when the rear companies took up the double step and closed up to the leading ones. They then marched on to the flag of the battalion, and wheeled to the left as before, thus entering on the third side of the square, after completing which it D they wheeled once more to the left and resumed the original alignment, having arrived at exactly the point from which each started, they were halted and fronted in their original position. The only other movement was an advance of the whole line simultaneously.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.
(SIXTH NOTICE—CONCLUDED.)

It requires no small effort of courage and endurance to descend to the dismal region to which sculpture is consigned, and to persevere through a complete review of the entire collection; and, when the task is over, poorly is it rewarded for the infliction how little is done amongst us for the promotion of the grandest and most sublime of the arts of design, and how little prospect of improvement there is so long as the powers that be have the sole regulation of the matter, and so long as we are of the stride we are making in painting and contrast with them the absolute falling off which we display in the sister art without being struck with the conviction that there must be some cause for it over which the labourers in the field have no control. Whether it be the influence of a vicious system of patronage and an uninformed public taste, added to the penalties of dreary darkness and unseemly crowding attached to any attempt at exhibition, the exercise of the art of sculpture in the land at present unquestionably has been for the last few years restricted to busts, monumental effigies, and testimonials—individual memorials, originating in egotism and personal vanity, often got up by subscription, and which the interests of art can only be said to subserve in degree considered. Now and then an ardent aspirant puts forward his pretensions to the higher walks of art, and when he does it is evidently only taken up because he has nothing better to do, and as a passport to notoriety and patronage in the now only remunerative employment of the busts of the age. These are not ideal, but they must not be blinked, nor their importance be underrated, if we would enter into a consideration of the probability of the art of sculpture upon a footing worthy of the intellectual genius of the age.

Of the historical or poetical works in the present exhibition the most important is that of Mr. Foley, the sculptor of the memorable statue upon it is Monti's group, "Piacere e dolore—Swift and Slow Hours" (558). The marvel of this work is the daring and masterly skill, the bold effort of imagination, as flying through the air, her weight being apparently in some degree supported by the light drapery which clings to her face and throat, of her arms and legs, and circles around and beneath her—an idea wrought out with great technical skill after the fashion of the best Roman Vitali and Greek of the Phidian period of 1851, but still one which we cannot approve of as worthy of the art, or even as suited to the nature of the situation. On the present occasion this figure are flowers in full bloom, carved in the round with great boldness and depth and sharpness of cutting. The other figure, that of Grief, is a creature of the poppy which is represented in opium and thistles. Both are very satisfactory in the modeling, and the execution throughout is of the best kind; but the idea of Time flying, art still maintains its pre-eminence. Another striking work, but of a wholly different character, is that entitled "Town and Country—a Gossip on Politics" (No. 1,000), by Mr. Bell, one of the most promising school prevails to the fullest extent. Afric's daughters, with their coal-black skin, their long, curly heads, coming out in full force, and all together apart from the stream, are absolute copies from life, and wonderful is the generic idiosyncrasy expressed in them.

J. S. Westmacott's female figure (948), supposed to be stooping over a stream, is graceful and pleasing; but his two bas-reliefs within two arches in the right frame (1045)—"Mercy and Truth are met together; Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other" (Psalm 85)—are of a very superior order of merit. The motives of the two subjects are elegant and touching, and the grouping of the figures throughout is harmonious in their contrast. The whole is conceived and executed in the purest taste. Pierce's two pictures (905 and 962), illustrative of the Christian Acts of Mercy, forming part of a monument recently erected, by command of the Queen, in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, to the memory of the late Bishops of Gloucester and Bristol—and the earliest spirit of the Revival, and display great power in invention and composition. The subject of the four in compartments are—1. Visiting the Sick, Distributing Bread, and Forgiveness of the Penitent.

J. Hancock's plaster group, "Melancholy and Mirth" (951), is an ambitious effort, but in execution does not quite come up to the mark. Melancholy is intended as a realisation of the

Penative nux, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure, in Milton's "Il Penseroso," Mirth of the "goddess fair and free" the heaven ybred of Jonson's "Allegro." Of the latter we have the "jocund walking" with even step and musing gait," the latter dancing up to her on "light fantastic toe," and seeking to poke her into good humour. The idea is a rather bold venture of the artist, and the very opposite creations into juxtaposition, and the result could only be a mongrel one in the hands of a sculptor who is not a thorough master. As it is, the work fails through the violence of the contrast between the two figures, and the excess of effort too plainly visible in that represented Mirth.

J. H. Foley's diploma work, "The Elder Brother in Comus" (969), exhibits the merits of classical study in the treatment of the figure is symmetrical, but attenuated perhaps, even beyond the point essential to grace. The head is finely set on the shoulders, and the face has all the expression of an listening attentively, eagerly, and anxiously to sounds of doubtful import. The upilted right hand assists this action from the left, which is resting on his staff.

"Fresh from the Bath" (987), by W. C. Marshall, though described as a portrait, is too elegant as a study of infant life to be placed in that category. The plump little fellow is rolling on his back over the egg he throws in the air, playing with a lily which he has gathered from the stream, the whole group with the water surrounding it. The roundness and softness of the flesh are admirable.

"Maternal Duty" (1,007), by G. Fergusson, a type of female beauty, exactly at the age between womanhood and childhood, is a pleasing subject, the attitude and expression being marked by grace and purity, in the mother's face and figure, which is bending fondly and proud around in sharp and unbroken folds.

"Jephtha and his Daughter" (953), by Fontana ("Thou hast brought me very low"—Judges xi. 35), is an unfavourable example of degenerate Italian art, small in purpose, and the subject tortured away with small work and the drapery heavy, and hanging in an ungraceful mass.

Another Italian artist, T. Ambuchi, is guilty of many sins against good taste and correct artistic judgment in a small group with a high aim, entitled "Love Triumphant" (1003). It consists of a female figure sustaining an infant, while she points the attention of a boy to a scroll which he holds in his hand. Though consisting of only three figures, the composition is overcrowded and confused; the figure of the boy, woman, her left leg lifted up upon a pile of stones, in order to support the weight of the baby, is by no means elegant. The carving in many points is far from what it should be; the limbs and figure of the infant are too long, and want roundness and fleshiness.

We remark a nice intention and elegant outline in G. Halse's marble statuette, "Nydia, the Blind Flower-girl" (962); and great simplicity and elegance in J. Durham's marble statue of "Charity" (1034). The execution in both works is of a highly praiseworthy character, and rank as to hold out promise of future success to their authors.

C. Wilkes's "Elegiac Poetry" (1001) is bold in conception, and presents many striking points in the performance, but the bust is cast in too heavy a mould for one of the muses; and a somewhat similar remark will apply to Mr. F. Woodington's "Ariel" (1087), which, barring this consideration, is in many respects a creditable performance. So, also, is the same artist's bas-relief, "The Captive" (1085), supposed "by the ruins of Babylon;" but the pose of the figure strikes us as a little uncertain.

Oh for something new in the "memorial line," if it is to be much longer extended! Mr. J. Bell, to whose hands the posthumous honours of the late Duke and men of the Royal Artillery with the Crimea have been confided, can think of nothing better to that end than a large figure of Victory, which, in the form of an angel, is placed on a memorial to be erected on the Parade at Woolwich. This large impersonation is represented descending from a cloud along cords and pendulum by belt, on which is inscribed, "Dieu et mon droit;" and is in the act of distributing wreaths of laurel among the crowds of the rank and file below provided.

The recent competition for memorial statues to that noble creature Havelock, whose love and bravery endeared his name to the army and the hearts of his countrymen, called forth many competitors, of whom Mr. Thornicroft appears to have been one. The small model he there exhibited was certainly not much, in wanting the head and hands. The hero of Lucknow is represented with his sword point downwards in his right hand, the bible in his left, and with his eyes cast up to heaven; and on the ground is the inscription "Thanks be to God, which giveth to us this victory." This attempted mixture of the soldier and the divine is not what is wanted as a commemoration of military service, whether in India or elsewhere, and suggests all the evils of an armed dictation of principles, which in India is especially to be deprecated. The heroic character of the soldier should be treated by art in all its sternness and singleness.

A very fine specimen of modeling in the precious metals may be pointed to in the "Shield presented by the County and City of Worcester to Major-General Pakington," Chairman of the Quarter Sessions during twenty-four years, designed by H. H. Armstead, and manufactured by Messrs. Elkington and Bookell. The designs, which are extremely nicely executed in low relief, are emblematic of the worthy Baronet's various public services as Free-trader of the Corporation, Colonial Secretary, and Minister of the great education, and Judge at sessions.

Amongst the miscellaneous subjects J. Thomas's colossal bust of the Prince Consort (946), executed for the Midland Institute, Birmingham, stands conspicuous, and is remarkable for the truth of the likeness and the praiseworthy simplicity of the treatment. Mr. Bennett Woodcroft's "Portrait Marble Statuette" of a Child (949) is a study full of originality and much promise. Mr. Bell's "Portrait Bust of a Gentleman" (1,004), executed by command of the Queen, and intended for the memorial unveiling to the figure, in hard marble, is a mistake in the application of material. Let us, in conclusion, commend the following:—"Bust of a Lady" (1,005), by Mr. Durham; "Bust of Mr. Mundy" (1,006), "The late General Sir William Napier" (967), by G. G. Adams; "Head of a Child" (1,008), by Mr. Foley; "Bust of Mr. Gibson" (1,035), by J. Thomas; "The Right Hon. Thomas Lefroy, Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, Ireland" (1020), with strongly-marked character, by J. Moore; "Bust of Mr. R.A." (1,021), by Bruhl Spanish Minister; and "Portrait Marble Statuette" of a Child (949) is a study full of originality and much promise. The lucky possessor of the bust is, we believe, a handsome income by its exhibition. In the aggregate the product of the sale did not exceed five hundred pounds.

The banquet usually provided for the Directors at the Crystal Palace, mainly through the instrumentality of good-natured Sir Joseph Paxton, rather contracted than expanded its dimensions this year, judging by the speeches, we could not help deploring the very small extent to which the schoolmaster seems to have been abroad in the instruction of English men and women in the French language. Even Lord Elcho, in the exception of Mr. Locke, M.P., there does not seem to have been an attempt in the whole party to speak French, even when the words of Stratford-atte-Bowe," as Geoffrey Chaucer has it. It was better, perhaps, under the circumstances, to adhere to the vernacular; and one can't regret the absence of the British Ambassador when the esteemed George IV. at the coronation of Charles X. at Rheims. The Ambassador of the day, not being much versed in French, thanks in a French speech for the proposal of the health of his Royal master. Addressing his Majesty of France, after much coughing, he began —"Sire, le lion, nous pense, nous—(cough as before)—nous—(cough), he couldn't get beyond "the King, my master"; and as "Le Roi, mon maître" he sat down, and remained so during the remainder of his sojourn in France.

We have a little word to say concerning "Turkish art." Our readers are aware that strict Mohammedans have an abhorrence of pictorial representations of the human form divine. The heterodox Persians, indeed, being of the Shiah sect, do not go so far in condemnation; but devout Osmanlis hate portraiture as bitterly as the old Puritans hated the painted glass. The consequence is, that, in the presents of diplomatic intercourse have, however, mitigated the severity of this prejudice, so far as the Turkish Court is concerned; and the other day a portrait of the Sultan, by a magnificent diamond bracelet, was presented by Dran Bey, the Turkish Minister at Brussels, to her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte. Not there being much of the Turk—political motive for this artistic present. The Don Basilico—or, considering their nationality, the Bastiloffs—of a certain Legation at Paris have been lately presented to the Emperor and Empress by the Belgian Government and the Porte, because the Duke de Brabant, on his recent visit to Constantinople, was so remember as a gift some magnificent chibouks, ornamented with diamonds, which the Sultan had sent him for his own particular smoking. The commander of the faithful, however, by the way, is reported to be the illustrious descendant of the son of King Leopold, gives a significant denial to the idle tittle-tattle which has been set afloat in connection with the appropriation of his diamond-mounted pipes by the young Belgian Duke. In any case the story is a curious parallel to one told about Ibrahim Pacha and the Duke of Wellington. Amongst the sights of London he was taken to the Bank of England; and the chief cashier, according to the pleasant custom, placed a small packet of bank-notes in his hand and told him that he had a million pounds sterling in his possession. Whereupon, so runneth the legend, the terrible commander of the Moslem hosts looked at it curiously, and quietly slipped the bank-notes into the pockets of his baggy gallipots. His Highness's imagination evidently conceived it meant was intended as backsheish, and it was with some difficulty and much perturbation that the authorities explained to his Highness that even the Bank of England was not empowered to make such costly presents.

The grand gallery of pictures at Belvedere, belonging to Sir Culling Eardley, has been greatly enriched by "another coup" or another Mr. David Teniers the younger, for 800 guineas; E. W. Cooke's "Goodwin Sands," for 730 guineas; two Rembrandts, purchased at the Van Slingelandt sale by the English Church at Amsterdam, and his wife, for 1850 guineas; Vandyke's "Snyders' Wife and Child," for 1000 guineas; Sir Joshua Reynolds' "Countess and Child Gainsborough Dupetion" of Esteban Murillo—larger than Marshal Soult's famous "Soult picture—for 1050 guineas; Gerard Douw's—not Dow's—"Dropsical woman in the Belvedere catalogue of prices. The Murillo was adjudged to Mr. Graves amidst "loud applause." The sum realised in one hour and a half reached the astonishing total of £35,387 10s.

Towards the close of this month two performances on a grand scale, undertaken last year by gentlemen connected with the Press, will take place, for the benefit of the widow and three young children of a literary man who died at Manchester, quite wearied and worn out, ten days ago. There is to be a morning performance, at St. James's Hall and a dramatic performance at Drury Lane Theatre. The literary man was Robert Barnabas Brough, the husband of the brother-in-law's cousin, on his way to Llangollen, where his friends had vainly hoped that he might pick up a little health, on Tuesday se'nnight. As a dramatic author, and in comic essay-writing, and verse, Robert Brough has been widely and favourably known to the public for thirteen years. He was pre-eminently a man of genius, full of wit, fancy, and humour, and one of the kindest of friends, the most brilliant of conversationists, and the sweetest of observers. He worked, in spite of everlasting health, almost incessantly to support his young wife and family, and he died poor, but not, thank God, friendless, at two-and-thirty years of age. If one person in five hundred of those who have laughed over Robert Brough's sparkling burlesques, or have been amused or touched by his poetic and prose writings, will contribute a shilling to the fund raising for the benefit of those left to raise for him, an estimable lady who knows her loss but too well, and three poor little babes too young to know it, will be adequately recovered in their most melancholy need.

LITERATURE AND ART.

THERE is a lull just now both in the republic of letters and in the empire of art. Crack shots would seem to be held in more importance in England than smart books, and artists appear to think more of hitting the bull's-eye than the public taste. The more peaceable class of painters are preparing for their sketching tours; and we hear of publishers who are diporting themselves on the banks of the Arno, or are "up at a villa" in the Apennines. Across the water the periodical pamphlet seems to have exhausted and absorbed all other kinds of literature. "The Cornhill," "Good Words," and "Macmillan" by "L'Empire du Rhin et le Royaume de Cologne." We suppose we shall next have brochures from M. Dumas' indefatigable press undertaking to prove that Folkestone is Boulogne, and that the natural modern boundary of France is at John o' Groat's House; and that the French won the battle of Agincourt. Of course "they manage these things better in France;" but we did our pamphleteering more than two centuries ago in the days of Bynne, Colman, Martin Marprelate, and rare Sir William Davenant, and trenchant Prince Penniless Nash, and fierce old Sir John Birkenhead. Those were the pamphleteers for brave invective, for good, sound, honest abuse. "He hath lately published three bandboxes against me," writes Rynne of an adversary, alluding to the custom of pasting sheets of works that did not sell inside those necessary travelling companions.

The sale of the once gay and cheerful Egyptian Hall are now indeed desolate. On Wednesday and Thursday last all the fittings of the Mont Blanc Room—the paintings, both of the "Monarch of Mountains," the Rhine, Paris, and the Canton River, and the multifarious contents of the Chinese Museum, formed by poor Albert Smith—were sold by auction. Many old friends were present, and many intrinsically trifling objects brought "rarity" prices as mementoes of the gifted man and good fellow to his last home. Thus, the Rev. Mr. Barham, the possessor of a bundle of "cash," a hundred of which, according to the correspondent of the Times, are to be buried with him, was seen shaving "a gentleman j" another bid eagerly for the model of a "golden lily," or Chinese lady's small foot; another purchased a set of cattle-bells from Switzerland; while others were content with a pilgrim's scrip, a fan, a kettle for heating "samshee," a tearbottle, an opium pipe, and a "cracke trade." Many would have prized a physician's tinctures, or a "cracke trade." Many would have prized the quaint little clock to the right of the proscenium from the halls, at whose last stroke of eight the lecturer was wont to dismiss with such ready and punctuality in his returns. The clock, however, was bought in. Some of the pictorial and other illustrations brought fabulous prices; but it was as amazing as melancholy to see the exquisite little rehearsal of landscape scenery by William Beverley, and the productions of which must have cost much time and labour, knocked down for a few shillings each. A beautiful panorama of the Canton River, by P. Phillips we saw purchased for a trifle by a friend. The lucky purchaser, by the by, is he wise, realise a handsome income by its exhibition. In the aggregate the product of the sale did not exceed five hundred pounds.

The banquet usually provided for the Directors at the Crystal Palace, mainly through the instrumentality of good-natured Sir Joseph Paxton, rather contracted than expanded its dimensions this year, judging by the speeches, we could not help deploring the very small extent to which the schoolmaster seems to have been abroad in the instruction of English men and women in the French language. He was pre-eminently a man of genius, full of wit, fancy, and humour, and one of the kindest of friends, the most brilliant of conversationists, and the sweetest of observers. He worked, in spite of everlasting health, almost incessantly to support his young wife and family, and he died poor, but not, thank God, friendless, at two-and-thirty years of age. If one person in five hundred of those who have laughed over Robert Brough's sparkling burlesques, or have been amused or touched by his poetic and prose writings, will contribute a shilling to the fund raising for the benefit of those left to raise for him, an estimable lady who knows her loss but too well, and three poor little babes too young to know it, will be adequately recovered in their most melancholy need.

THE CONSTANTINOPLE LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.

—Mr. Fry closed the course of lectures for the season a few days ago, by a discourse on "Henry Lord Brougham." Our Ambassador was present. This institution is progressing favourably under the presidency of Mr. Fry, who formed; members are daily admitted, and it is expected that at the close of the season a number of lectures, from eminent men in the Metropolis, and it will give the English community at Pera an opportunity of literary and scientific intercourse, which has hitherto been wanting, and will be a means of doing great good.

THE CHARLATAN CASE.—The Gibraltar Chronicle of the 22nd ult. says:—"We are informed that Mr. Martin Escalante, a British subject, who had resided for many years in this city, after a most patient investment of upwards of fifteen months in Cadiz, at Malaga was arrested in the night of May, 1859, and after being given to various persons copies of the Old Testament in the Spanish language, and was brought to trial on the charge of attempting to change the religion of Spain. The discovery was made that the charge was a perjured, and sentenced him to nine years' hard servitude. The sentence, it is understood, compared with the practical acts charged against Mr. Escalante, excited much astonishment. The friends of religious toleration and liberty of conscience will be glad to learn that Escalante's imprisonment is not considered by the British Government as must be attributed to the circumstance that he was a British subject. The case has been referred to a superior Court, the Audiencia Territorial, which has annulled the sentence pronounced by the district judge, and declared Mr. Escalante innocent of the offence with which he was charged, and ordered the costs of the procedure to be defrayed by the Crown."

ORDER OF THE COUNCIL OF CHARLES VII. OF FRANCE FOR THE DEMOLITION OF THE ENGLISH COATS-ARMORIAL IN THE CASTLE OF ROUEN.

THE original (in old French) of the subjoined injunction is preserved in the Add. MSS. at the British Museum. It has never before been printed; though, as an historic fragment illustrative of a period when the sapiensness of the Government, influenced by Queen Margaret of Anjou, permitted our Norman provinces to be wrested from us, it certainly deserves publicity. To the historian, indeed, it possesses peculiar interest, since it serves to show that the English surrender of Rouen, or at least of its stronghold, took place some months before the date usually assigned to the evacuation :—

This is to order the destruction of certain armories of England remaining in the castle and palace of the King our Lord at Rouen, which, by the ordinance of the Lords of his great Council, have been ordered to be defaced and erased, seeing that the said armories are a mark or relic of the memory of the sovereignty usurped by the English. And forit is proper to remove the armories which are designed in three parts upon the great tower of the palace, which forms the corner of the River Seine. And, in like manner, it is proper to remove other armories of the King upon a little tower near to the same great tower. Likewise, in the gallery of the said castle towards Saint Patrick, at a window of brickwork overhanging the Seine, are many armories and devices, as roots (?) and other things, which it is proper to remove and erase. And the labour of removing the said armories, the providing of workmen and paying of wages, has been undertaken at a price by Master Nicole Duval, mason, for the sum of 81 livres tournois. In the year of grace MCCCCXLIX, the 21 day of January, in the Court of our Lord the King at Rouen, before Guillaume Gonbert, Esquire, and the said place, appeared Guillaume Pontis, deputy to Richart Desbuez, during the time the said Desbuez was in the army of the King our Lord, engaged for the carrying on of his wars, in the office of master of the works of carpentry of the King our Lord, and in the bailliage of Rouen, who informed us, and has related upon oath that, with respect to the above mentioned works of the castle and the performance thereof according to that which is above written, he had made three proclamations in the customary locality, making known that the contract of adjudication would be this day given before us or our Lieutenant to the last bidder. After which notice we caused it to be several times proclaimed, that it might learn if there were any person who would state the said work, or perform it for less than the price aforesaid. And since no person has appeared for the performance thereof the said work remained, and was given and adjudged to the said master Guillaume Du Val, for the said price of 81 livres tournois, for all things. Made the day and year above. —DURAMEL.—(Add. MSS.)

In the same collection (Chart 4065) is another document, a complement of the above, showing that the order of Council was duly carried out, and which, literally translated, runs thus :—

I, Guillaume Pontis, mason, subject to Messire, deputy under Richart Desbuez, master of the works of the said trade for the King our Sovereign in the bailliage of Rouen, during the time that he Desbuez was occupied in the service of the King our Lord, engaged in the wars carrying out of his wars, certify to all to whom it appertains that, by the ordinance and commandment of the Lords the Treasurers of the King, Master Nicole Du Val, mason, dwelling at Rouen, has taken away and erased the armories of stone made in the form of the arms of England which were in the lower part of the lodging and palace of the Castle and Palace of the King our Lord at Rouen, according to the order thereof given to him under those treasurers' seals, which I have seen, which I use in the exercise of my said commission. Which arms have been well and duly erased, according to the contract, as has been set down to the letter. In witness whereof I have set my seal and presents with my said seal the xiiij of May in the year MCCCC.—PONTIS.

THE LEGEND OF ST. PATRICK'S HAND.

Not long since we were gravely informed by one of the spirit-raising journals that the shadowy fingers of Dante had been evoked, and seen, before several witnesses, to convey a sprig of orange-flower to the bevy of his poetical sisters. We may be pardoned, therefore, for relating a tradition which concerns the real, substantial, though legendary hand of St. Patrick, and which requires no greater degree of faith to warrant its credibility :—

A tidal basin in Lough Cone, alias Strangford, connected with the Irish Channel, flows up the River Quoile at Downpatrick, and washes the base of a hill which, in one of its caves, is said to contain the skeletal of the see of Down once stood, now replaced by a modern edifice. The consecrated ground still remains distinct; rendered more sacred as the burial-place of St. Patrick, who died there in A.D. 493, and was there interred. In the same narrow house were deposited the mortal remains of St. Bridget (one of the three Irish Saint and Princess), by some, who advocated the marriage of priests, said to have been the spouse of St. Patrick; by others, the Canoness of the abbeying Nunnery of Sani, where she presided over her holy auspices. However this may be, they are generally supposed to occupy a portion of the traditional double grave, with the remainder of the see of Down once stood, now replaced by a modern edifice. The consecrated ground still remains distinct; rendered more sacred as the burial-place of St. Patrick, who died there in A.D. 493, and was there interred. In the same narrow house were deposited the mortal remains of St. Bridget (one of the three Irish Saint and Princess), by some, who advocated the marriage of priests, said to have been the spouse of St. Patrick; by others, the Canoness of the abbeying Nunnery of Sani, who presided over her holy auspices. However this may be, they are generally supposed to occupy a portion of the traditional double grave, with the remainder of innumerable pilgrims to do homage to their sanctity. A splendid memorial of the last place of sepulture was said, to have been erected by St. Columba, who left other monuments of his pious munificence at Hy-Columb-Kill—that is, the Island of Columb's Church, or Iona, on the coast of Argyle, in Scotland. This Columba is said to have been a disciple of St. Patrick, and had frequent intercourse with Ireland through the Port of Lecargavy, one of the ancient Kings, whom he assisted in arranging an amicable settlement with his turbulent bards or Ileas, who seem to have been the Seaters or Privy Council of the kingdom. The Port of Lecargavy, who was converted to Christianity by St. Patrick, St. Columba, who left other monuments of his piety, by a solemn injunction that, whenever he died, his body should be laid in St. Patrick's grave. He breathed his last as Icolumbkill; but at that period, during one of the hurricanes which assaults with violence the western coast, a solemn injunction that, whenever he died, his body should be laid in St. Patrick's grave. He breathed his last as Icolumbkill; but at that period, during one of the hurricanes which assaults with violence the western coast, a tidal wave, which appeared to have risen from the ground for a long, long period. A scroll on the lid gave the name of the deceased, "Columba," with a direction that it should be deposited in St. Patrick's grave. All heard of his tomb but his body, and the search proved, as an impassable difficulty, therefore, arose in fixing on the precise place of sepulture, when, in the absence of discussion and anxious inquiry as to the exact site, an aged hand was seen slowly to emerge from the ground with an episcopal ring on one of the fingers, as if held forth to offer the hospitality of a resting-place to his saintly brother. The mysterious omen was accepted by the clergy and the people; the immigrant coffin was deposited in the grave thus distinguished, and, in testimony of this miraculous intervention, the protruded hand was covered by some of the holy men then present, was covered with a case of silver wire gilt, and for a long time used as a charm in the case of various diseases. For many centuries it remained in possession of a respectable family named Russell, with whom it was seen by the writer of this note. It is now said to be in the safe keeping of a right reverend prelate of the Roman Catholic Church.

JAPANESE CHESS IN PHILADELPHIA.

The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, which appears to be by far the most able and respectable exponent of chess in the United States, contains an exceedingly interesting narrative of a visit to the chess-room of the Japanese Embassy to the Philadelphia Chess Club. From this account we extract the following :—

"With our characteristic enterprise, we determined at the outset to convert the Japanese visit into a grand match between the champions of Asiatic and Occidental chess, and we indulged strong hopes of embellishing to-day's columns with a Japanese problem and game. Tomoo Bogen-no-kami, and Tatswandi Ogurwakura, or some of the other leading players of the Nyphon Ko-ku-jo-ki-ku-sho.

"A set of Japanese chessmen, which we borrowed from a friend for the purpose, served in the place of a demonstration board. In the reception-room, where a couple of our strange guests were busily occupied with a variety of articles strewed over their table, they immediately recognized the chessmen, and turned them out on the table to explain their use. In the absence of a board they asked, in very intelligible language, for a piece of paper, and with extraordinary rapidity laid out a 'board,' writing the names of the pieces, with great accuracy, in their appropriate squares. We shall print this photograph elsewhere very highly as an interesting memento of the Embassy.

"Having amused ourselves with these as a familiar game among our visitors, our next aim was to witness their play, and to this end we brought out our diplomatic set-to box, to secure a visit from some of the Japanese players to the rooms of the Philadelphia Chess Club. But here our troubles began, and it would be for some amusing to our readers than it was to ourselves if we were to narrate our experiences in pursuit of this laudable object.

"In the first place, with whom we could not succeed, we received the utmost politeness and courtesy, and endless promises to promote our wishes, but the promises were not fulfilled, and we soon found that the difficulties in the tremendous that all our attempts to prosecute our investigations into this subject, as literature, Geography, Government, Home and Foreign Government, and culture had not Dr. M'Donald, of the United States' Navy-Department, some obligation to assist him on behalf, and at the eleventh hour procured for us the much-desired interview.

"But, alas! how fallacious are human hopes and expectations! After every difficulty seemed to be overcome, an obstacle arose upon which we had not counted, and, in the place of meeting the Naval Lieutenant, we found he become most unconfortably familiar. We allude to the immobility and caprice of the Japanese chessmen, which most inconsiderately refused to obey the mechanical movement. 'One man can lead a horse to water, but ten cannot make him drink,' said the old adage, and we found it equally true that a chessboard, arrayed in great style and accompanied by the redoubtable 'Tommy,' carrying a sword instead of a cane, would be himself, and not to be led to the carriage. One of them suddenly took it into his head to change his mind, and, making some trifling excuse, left the room, and the rest followed. All explanations and entreaties were utterly fruitless, and in a few moments they abruptly terminated our visit, and retired to their own quarters.

"We might well have now abandoned the pursuit in despair, but all Chesdom was thoroughly aroused in the matter, and the Naval Lieutenant, more of the chief, a final, and, we are happy to say, a successful, effort was made to accomplish our purpose.

"Through the kind offices of the gallant Captain Porter, to whom, in connection with all the members of the Naval Commission, we Philadelphians are indebted for a thousand courtesies, a number of the best chessplayers were invited to visit our rooms, which they did about noon yesterday.

"The delegation consisted of eight of the nobility, each carrying his long, heavy sword in one hand, and some of them a light fan in the other. After a few minutes spent in exchanging salutations (for which purpose nearly all of them had manufactured 'calling cards' with their names in English on the table which had been prepared for them, and the first game of Japanese chess ever played in a Christian land (except we have been told that a game in the mansion of the Japanese quarters since the Embassy reached America) was begun. The players, one of whom, Yamada Wongajee, is one of the handsomest men we ever saw, drew for the first move, by tossing one of the Pawns into the middle of the board. They were then presented to the table facing the opponent, and the game proceeded by the advance of the Pawns, followed by the other pieces. The board and the pieces had been marked and numbered, and we had hoped to be able to make some record of the game for publication, but this was impossible, as the players all scrambled to see and saw that the attempt would be entirely fruitless. As the game progressed it was found necessary to make explanations of the moves to the interpreter (one of the players was rapidly gaining ground, and they all laughed heartily), but good-natured explanations and laughter were all that could be accomplished on Saturday and Monday.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY.

In consequence of the extraordinary continuance of unfavourable weather the summer modes have a great difficulty this year in making their ordinary debut, much to the regret of the Parisians, as well-doubtless, as to that of many of our fair readers; and the modistes have joined in the complaints made by many other commercial branches on account of the dulness of the spring, which has been one of the most unprolific in the annals of female dress during the present century. Like good generals, however, the dressmakers of the French capital have not been idle in making their arrangements for the summer campaign, in which they may justly hope to make up for lost time. They and the linendrapers have entered with spirit upon the summer operations, as witness the large and beautiful stocks of light silks of all descriptions, barège dresses of the most tasteful patterns, and a collection of gazes de Chambery that renders a selection difficult. A still greater difficulty, however, will occur in the choice of the bonnets, for they are as rich in variety as they are elegant in their composition. It may be well to remark that they are of somewhat larger size than those worn in Paris during the spring, and of greater proportions in all respects than the small adhering chapeaux that grace the heads of our fair countrywomen. Of the two selected from a magasin of the Rue Richelieu we give a short description. The first was a rice-chip, with lace bavolet and black velvet bow and ends in the centre of it, and an elegant white rolling feather; the tour-de-tête composed of lace and dasies mixed with black velvet, the flower over the centre of the forehead surmounted by gilt stars. The second, equally charming, was of white silk; blonde fall, cap of blue flowers and blonde, bottom of the crown relieved by blue flowers and velvet bow, the latter enlivened with one or two of the gilt ornaments just now, it would seem, de rigueur.

We cannot believe that this yellow invasion of earrings, waist-bands, and buckles is destined for a long existence; for if such were the case European ladies would eventually look more like the fair sex in New Zealand than denizens of that quarter of the globe in which civilisation has hitherto been considered as marching hand in hand with good taste.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Light grey striped silk robe, with flat, high-necked, and round corsage, and plain skirt; the waistband fastened with a Byzantine buckle. Scarf-mantelet of the same material as the dress, trimmed with a small flounced edging. Muslin collar and sleeves. Bonnet of white tulle, sloping rather sharply towards the ears, and ornamented with a cap composed of small rosebuds and blonde.

Fig. 2. Dress for an Evening Party.—This dress is also of silk, but light-blue in colour and low-necked as to the corsage, which is brought to a point at the bottom of the chemisette. The chemisette itself is plaited, and bordered with Valenciennes lace insertion. Plain skirt. The sleeves are very short, and consist simply of a small flounce falling gracefully over large lace sleeves drawn in at the wrist and fastened by a bracelet. The headdress is composed of a row of jet beads, terminated by silk bows corresponding in colour with the robe.

Fig. 3. Dress for a Young Lady.—The skirt of this convenient dress is of piqué, having a white ground sprinkled over with small Pompadour flowers. As in the preceding Illustration, the jupe is quite plain. The casaque is of light-coloured flannel, very long-waisted, descending to a point, and fastened with buttons. The sleeves, close-fitting at the top, gradually increase in width, and are drawn in at the wrist, which is fastened with an elastic bracelet. Plain linen collar. Headdress of black velvet in the back hair, enlivened by a few of the before-mentioned gilt trinkets.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

In the days when essays were a part of our literature many of its high professors thought the advantages of foreign travel a subject sufficiently recondite, and certainly sufficiently interesting, to occupy their attention, and to form the groundwork of elaborate discourses. In comparatively modern times the same subject was utilised as the groundwork of treatises at the Universities, and, of course, of themes at schools; and, if we remember rightly, Lord Eldon when at Oxford gained a prize for English composition upon exactly that text. No doubt the enforced insularity of our population caused this subject to be made matter of almost curious inquiry, and the distinction of having gone through what was called the grand tour was viewed in a half-envious, half-ridiculous light. The locomotion of English Sovereigns and English Princes was still more circumscribed than that of the nobility and gentry; and the progresses of George IV. to the different parts of his dominions were innovations so decided as to create an enthusiasm somewhat factitious as regarded the individual, but probably very real as regarded the King. Of course, Royalty has partaken of the general rage for travel, which in an especial degree now characterises almost every class of persons in this country, and the interchange of visits between Monarchs and Potentates of regal and princely estate has become as much an established if not as frequent a custom as the autumnal run over Europe is to those of the general public, English and foreign, who have the leisure and the necessary means. The journeyings of Emperors, and Queens, and Kings, especially when they culminate in Royal congresses, are seldom without a purpose, indirect or immediate; but still they are parts and symbols of a system which seems to be generally settled, and on which probably the prophets and expectants of universal peace and goodwill among men, not without reason, base a great deal of their hopes for the attainment of that commercial and social millennium in the proximate advent of which they believe. At this moment great interest is felt in a progress of travel on the part of the Heir Apparent to the throne of these realms. The first aspect in which the visit of the Prince of Wales to Canada presents itself to our idea is, that it is to be considered as an act, and a very important one, in that careful and judicious education which has included so large a mental training and such a bent in the direction of experience of the institutions, habits, and feelings of the empire over which he will one day be called on to reign, as is fitting and necessary to guide the future conduct of a constitutional Monarch. As a part of an education which is to adapt a young man for the purposes of active life it is now recognised that travel and personal examination of men and things, and countries, in all their varieties and contrarieties, is as nearly indispensable as possible. The doctrine that "homecoming youths have ever honesty in sense to be recognised in all the world" finds a fresh section of the educational course of the Prince of Wales has not been neglected. His visits to the Continent have already probably initiated him into that expansion of idea which must result in the self-reliance which is among the imperceptible effects of high travel. No doubt that impression was duly taken to make those visits, while they contributed to his pleasure, amusement, and recreation, subservient to an inquiry into the polity and the organisation of foreign countries, and to due comparison with the constitution and construction of our own systems, governmental and social. In so far object, likely the

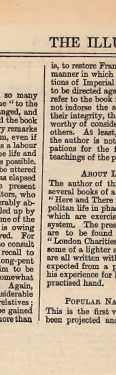
LITERATURE.

MEMORIALS OF THOMAS HOOD. Moxon.

These memorials of a writer who in his day bore with him so many sympathies as to justify the dedication of the present volume "to the people for whom he wrote and laboured," are collected, arranged, and edited by his daughter, with a preface and notes by his son, and the book is illustrated with copies from his own sketches. The prefatory remarks are written in a spirit which would at once disarm criticism, even if we were inclined to look with nice scrutiny on that which is a labour of filial love, and which is at the same time a picture of the life and feeling of a man of whom we are glad to know as much as possible. The only criticism which in such a case would be likely to be uttered would be a doubt as to the subject of the lengthy preface which has elapsed between the death of Hood and the appearance of the present volumes. But even this is satisfactorily answered by the editor, who tells us state that none can tell how solemn, how sad, and unutterably absorbing were the feelings of mingled pleasure and pain called up by the task; and, although the latter predominated, there was some of the former experienced in the course of its performance. It is owing chiefly to this that the publication has been so long delayed. For all his children "to turn over the manuscript for these pages—to consult the letters written in his well-known, clear hand—was to recall to memory such a flood of recollections of dead joys, of long-past sorrows, of gentle, loving deeds and words, that they claim to be excused if they were slow in time-serving and lingered somewhat over pages that were often hidden from them by their tears." Again, it is stated that the editors are well aware that there is considerable ground for the popular objection to biographies written by relatives; but they were of opinion that in this case the advantages to be gained by the authorship of some leading literary men of the day were more than balanced by the intimate knowledge and understanding they had of all the incidental acts of their father's life. Although, as the book shows, he numbered among his friends many distinguished writers, they could none of them know, nor could his children impart to them, that inner, private life which, in a measure, gave a stamp to the character his writings claimed for him—that of a benevolent, loving Christian man. They were the letters enabled to prepare these memorials because they were never wanted for any length of time from their parents, and their father ever made of them companions and playfellows. The case in favour of the book, so far as the editors are concerned, seem to us to be made out. As regards the plan and arrangement, it may be stated that each chapter, with the exception of two, contains the events of a year. In the letters, which contain a good deal of the work, although there is, from the necessity of the case, something of sameness, there is on the whole little or no repetition, strictly so called. In the last volume some of Hood's less-known effusions, which have not been included in the later editions of his works, have been reprinted, and a few pieces hitherto unpublished, and which are for the most part more or less unfinished, have been added. The illustrations consist in the first place of two fac-similes—the one of a sheet of "The Song of the Shirt," as first written out, and the other the sketch for his own monument, drawn by Hood towards the close of his last illness. The remaining vignettes are from sketches rapidly dashed off by him at different times for the amusement of his children, and which are calculated to give an excellent notion of his peculiar artistic skill. For the rest it may be said that there is nothing in the records which the work contains which does not bear testimony to the simple, kindly nature, as well as to the great benevolence, of a man in whom humour and wit, spontaneous and ever-flowing, were combined with great powers of insight, and deep impressions of everything that was excellent and good, and quick and accurate perceptions of the beautiful and picturesque. Of the student of character and the moralist we find not merely traces, but a pervading character, in all his letters; and one cannot but feel every possible sympathy with the undeviating and untiring devotion of an assiduous and zealous brain-worker, who laboured for the greatest part of his life under the disadvantages and disbackings arising from ill health and physical suffering. If the memory of Hood and the remarkable nature of his literary labours have yielded somewhat to the lapse of time, the volumes before us will serve to recollect of a writer whose name is associated with everything that was cheerful and pleasant, and, at the same time, with purpose, dictated by fellow-feeling and a desire for the well-being of his kind.

THE NEW REVOLUTION. By R. H. PATTERSON. W. Blackwood.



The subject-matter of this volume is sufficiently indicated by its second title,—namely, "Aquicolous Policy in Europe." With the exception of a few comparatively unimportant articles reprinted from Blackwood's Magazine and the Press newspaper. The remarkable feature of the papers in question consists in, that most of them were written at a time when the circumstances which they dwelt on were either unthought of or discredited, and therefore subsequent events have given to them a character of prescience which now almost on the height of prophecy. Their object was and is to exhibit to the public an idea of the far-reaching policy of the Emperor of the French. The keynote to that policy seems to be struck in the statement that in his views and objects Louis Napoleon does not follow his own interests as opposed to the desires of France. He is, it is stated, one who ever to concentrate himself from the national sympathies. He will give effect to those desires in a manner more advantageous than himself, but he will never disregard them. Deriving his throne from universal suffrage, and centring in himself the whole powers of government, he seeks in his policy to give expression to the fundamental desires of the French nation. He pays regard, not to clique in the capital, nor to the coteries of self-constituted parliamentary chiefs, which his immediate predecessors were too apt to mistake for entire France, but to those enduring aims and instincts which lie at the bottom of the national character of the French people. He has frequently disregarded and repressed the superficial fret and fume of the nation; for he knows in reality himself as well as they do what were to become their leader in a race that starts from folly; but he will ever join with the tide—yea, he anticipates and leads it, because he knows the national feelings are truly implicated, and where he sees that he can lead them to a prosperous result. His personal interests, so far from being opposed to attain the full development of these his strongest motive for adopting it. His main motives of self-interest are to keep himself on the throne, and to leave a name behind him; and this he can only hope to accomplish by ruling France as France wishes to be ruled—by conducting the Imperial policy in accordance with the national desires, and with the vigour and ability requisite to carry that policy successfully to its goal. He does nothing by accident or impulse. His grasp throughout the progress of this very able series of papers is based. It is urged that since the commencement of 1859 the cherished aims of the Emperor have begun to manifest themselves; and, as he is already past the time of life best fitted for action, it is stated that it may be expected that he will seek to accomplish his projects without delay: and it is here sought to exhibit his character and the workings of his bold, subtle, and far-reaching policy. It is contended that if his ambition were to culminate and end with the annexation of Savoy and Nice, it is probable that few would regard this aggrandisement in a grudging spirit or with very minute criticism. But such a belief is urged to be inconsistent with the character which the Emperor has declared with his own voice to belong to him—that is, to restore France to her true place among the nations. For the manner in which this is worked out and made applicable to the interests of Imperial France towards this country, and how it is assumed to be directed against the position and influence of England, we must refer to the book itself. Although, perhaps, there are many who will not indorse the sentiments and opinions expressed in this volume in their integrity, there are, we imagine, few who will deny that they are worthy of deliberate and most respectful consideration in many others. At least, there is very much which goes far to prove that the author is not without warrant for his belief, and that his anticipations of future events are mainly, if not altogether, based on the teachings of the past.

ABOUT LONDON. By J. EWING RITCHIE. Tinsley.

The author of this little work is favourably known as the writer of several books of similar character, such as "The London Pulpit," "Here and There in London," &c., which consist of sketches of metropolitan life in places with which many persons are not familiar, but which are exercising a powerful if not a silent influence on our social system. The present volume contains twenty chapters, among which are to be found "Sketches among Smugglers," "Around Coal," "London Charities," "Town Morals," "Criminal London," and others, some of a lighter and one or two of a antiquarian character. They are all written with such a knowledge of each subject as might be expected from a perceptive and accurate observer who has gathered his experience for himself, while the descriptive writing is that of a practised hand.

POPULAR NATURAL HISTORY. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin.

This is the first volume of an illustrated educational work which has been projected and carried into execution by Mr. Cassell. It is an excellent contribution to zoological science. The subject-matter is that of the class Mammalia, and it embraces treatises on four-handed animals, wing-handed animals, insect-eating animals, rodents or gnawers, cloven-footed animals, flesh-eating animals, scattered into tribes, families, and genera, and still further into species, each of which was in peculiar characteristics. The results of the labours of the most eminent naturalists in this and other countries are brought to bear on this compilation; and, keeping clear of the controversies which have arisen between men who have respectively devoted themselves to the observation of the habits of animals and those who were more anxious to consider the exact place which an animal occupies in creation, the subject-matter is reduced to a system. Technicalities are explained, English terms employed wherever it was practicable, and the descriptions are illustrated by numerous anecdotes derived from a great variety of trustworthy sources; and, when to this are added no less than five hundred illustrations, it may be said that the work is well worthy of attention, and gives full earnest of the value of the volumes which are to follow.

THE TRAMPS JUNIOR. By ARTHUR SMITH. Chapman and Hall.

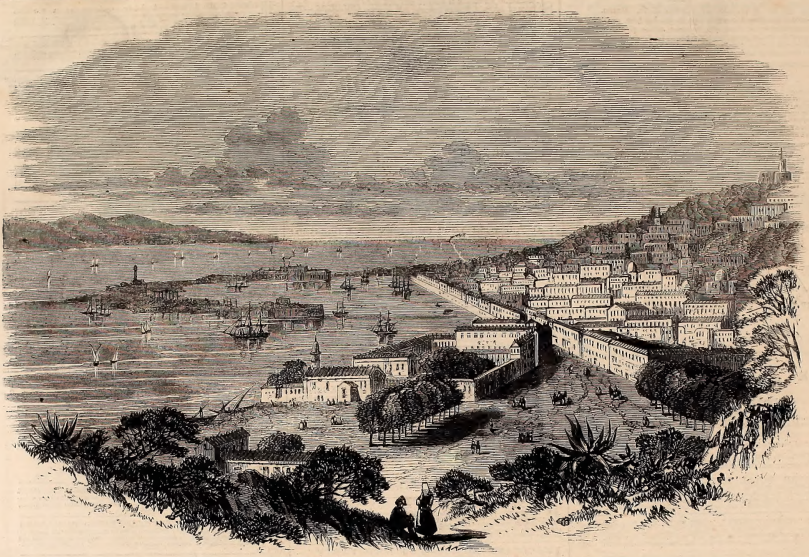
This is a smart little shilling manual, by a brother to Albert of pleasant memory. It would be rather difficult to describe the mode in which it has been constructed, as verse, woodcuts, and dialogue have all been called upon to play their part. Smith Julius "Pacator"), Brown, Jones, and Robinson, hold a lively dialogue, to begin with, near Paddington Lock. Then we have a summer idyl, showing how the merry fairies life is the coolest and best of any, in the days when every one is glad to seek the "sweet, shady side of Pall-mall," and when, as the author sings,

> In Hungerford's gay halls
> The penny ice collapses, and scarce
> Rang with the popping of self-shooting corks.

This is, however, the same fringe of the matter, and soon we have chapters on "Materials for Thames Angling," "Different Descriptions of Fish, and Manner of Angling for Them," which show a profound study, not of "Cole upon Littleton," but of Ephemera upon Izaak Walton. Fishing-stations and locks between Teddington and Oxford all come under review in their turn, with the rules of the Thames Preservation Society; then a few hints on "Cooking"; and, lastly, a general homily to anglers, under twenty heads, which, if well got up, may serve to help many a hero in difficulties, and prevent him the second mortification, for instance, of seeing his gentles turn to grubs, and his worms dry into bits of wire from exposure to the sun; or his trout become dull in the scale, simply because they are not rolled in stinging-nettles or flannel.

ROUGH TYPES OF ENGLISH LIFE. By the late JELINGER COOKSON SYMONS, Esq. B.A. James Blackwood.

This little volume has a melancholy interest, for its clever and amiable author died at the time the book was being printed. Mr. Symons, as an accommodation to a friend, undertook the proof sheets; but, alas! his own work does credit to his talents and reputation. In it he has turned to excellent account his experience and knowledge, both as an advocate of note at the Assizes and as a Government Inspector of Schools. These types of English life are full of animation and truth. The chapter on our social peculiarities, with its apt remarks on dining out, and the chapter on popular superstitions, with its startling and ghastly anecdotes, cannot but fix the attention and of some of Mr. Symons's experiences at the Bar, and among them he relates, with powerful effect, that singular and romantic trial of the Rev. Mr. Smith and his wife at Gloucester, in which Mr. Symons acted for the defence. Mr. Symons's book, published a year ago, shows how he could rescue a subject from dullness, as in "Julius," shows how he could rescue a subject from dullness, as in "Julius," and this posthumous publication proves further how pleasantly he could discourse on general subjects.



Guidebooks.—As the season for travelling and relaxation is fast approaching it is only natural to expect that guidebooks should begin to appear. One or two of this class of publications have come to us. Among them is a "Guide to the Isle of Wight," prepared by the Rev. Richmond Yelverton, B.A., and published by Bogue. This volume is stated to be to supply a deficiency in the existing guidebooks, and to present a faithful picture of the island, with a beautiful little island which shall tend to direct observation to its history, antiquities, and architecture, as well as to the natural treasures it contains. This purpose is carried out very fully in the present volume. Messrs. A. and C. Black have issued a guide to Gloucester, Hereford, and Monmouthshire, counties which, amongst the most attractive in England, being studded with a variety of objects interesting and to be visited by those engaged in the various pursuits of agriculture, trade, and commerce. The work contains descriptions of Bath, Bristol, Cheltenham, Chepstow, Gloucester, Hereford, Monmouth, Ross, Tintern Abbey, and Wye, as well as a sketch of the geology of the counties of Gloucester and Hereford. The same publishers present the public with a "Guide to Scotland, under the title of Where shall We Go?" furnishes a guide to the waterings-places of England, Scotland, and Ireland, notices of which are placed in alphabetical order. The convenience of this arrangement is obvious, and convenience is still further consulted in the portability of the volume.

GENERAL TURR.

GENERAL STEPHEN TURR, Garibaldi's alter ego, is, like the great chief himself, a man of romantic antecedents as well as of exalted character. General Turr is a native of Hungary, and comes of a noble although not a titled family. He is about thirty-five or thirty-six years of age, tall, handsome, and of distinguished appearance and soldierly bearing. In early life he served in the Austrian army, but went over to the Liberal side [at the celebrated Fonte di Buffaleta. When quite a youth he distinguished himself by some chivalrous acts of humanity towards his opponents, as well as the Italians, which his commission in the Austrian service enabled him to perform. On one occasion, in Brescia, Turr was passing a house whence he heard shrieks of distress. Entering, followed by a squad of his soldiers, he found a family in the hands of the brutal Croats, and rescued two beautiful girls from their barbarity. Such incidents as these determined the young soldier to devote his sword to the cause of liberty when Hungary rose against the tyranny of the Hapsburgs. Throughout that war he fought bravely; and when hostilities between Hungary and Austria broke out he offered his services, which were accepted, to this country. Being sent with Prince Frederick Pierre to select and purchase horses for the British troops, the zeal of Turr led him to expose himself somewhat rashly to the Austrian authorities, and he was seized at Bucharest while wearing a British uniform, thrown into a dungeon, and condemned to be hanged. The British authorities interfered, and Turr was released as a special compliment, as it was alleged, to England, by neutral Austria. For fifteen weeks, however, Turr had lain in a dungeon whose walls were dripping with wet. His naturally fine constitution received a violent shock. The writer of this brief memoir happened to have been one of the first of those who demanded the release of Turr, and the ground of his being in the British service when captured. Subsequently he was employed by the Foreign Enlistment Office, and became the medium of communication between the Government and the emancipated captive, who came in search of those who had, as he had been informed, saved his life by their interference: his gratitude was truly touching.

Turr fought in the Crimea towards the close of the war, and was present at the battle of Tchernaya. In Circassia he was made the acquaintance of Sefer Bey, reigning Prince of that country; and, when peace was proclaimed between Russia and the Allied Powers, Turr declined accepting the Order of Nicholas. During the Circassian operations on behalf of Circassia, in connection with a committee of which Viscount Raynham, M.P., was the head, Turr was the able and talented editor of the Daily News: Messrs. Beales and Birkbeck; Mr. George Leveson; Captain Bell, of the Times, and others, were members, and Mr. A. B. Richards, Q.C., was, we believe, the chairman. Sefer Bey's hero gave way, and the effects of his imprisonment became lamentably evident. One evening Turr was seized with apoplexy, during which, in spite of remonstrance, he would not cease to excite himself; he broke a bloodvessel, and lay for dead. Turr was expected to live. During this period the devotion and manly simplicity of his nature became manifest. His only regret was that he could not die on the battle-field for his country, as he had come to consider it. At last he recovered sufficiently to go out to the East, by medical advice, as his sole chance of prolonging life. Then, as now, he was ready to write, robbed of his all, unacknowledged by the British authorities, when suddenly, at the very moment his friends expected to hear the last of him, he joined the Italian army, and was encamping reached the sick-bed of Turr, performing a miracle upon him. The writer received a letter from Turr, dated from the camp, "I go to join Garibaldi," and shortly after, "In six days I shall be at Milan." And he was there. After this the deeds of Turr, ever in front of the battle, became those of the commander-in-chief of Garibaldi—were chronicled by the British newspapers, and are matters of history. At length he was made Lieutenant-General, and his unfeebled constitution, would have perished on the field had he not been rescued and tended by a noble Italian lady who chanced to see him. From that time the next event of Turr is Sicily. His record has never been perfectly healed, but he has done wonders in Sicily—ever forward in danger, ever ready to succour the wounded friend and adviser of Garibaldi. On one occasion he dragged the chief from under fire at a critical moment, when he had fallen dead in the arms of Garibaldi himself, while Turr was struck in the leg.

General Turr is a man of the most exalted character and amiable disposition. Having had an opportunity of conversing with him by a friend with the fact that a young English lady of fortune, and of the most prepossessing appearance, entertained sentiments in his favour, and that probably her father would not oppose the match, Turr, who at that time had risked almost everything that he had in a venture on behalf of Circassian independence, replied that enough had been said about the Poles and his countrymen, as well as exiles generally, bettering their fortunes by wealthy marriages in England, and that for his part he would rather die than incur the imputation to which their conduct subjected them. Such is Stephen Turr, at present the General commanding a division of the army of the liberator Garibaldi Dictator of Sicily.

VIEW OF MESSINA.—FROM A DRAWING BY MR. WREFORD.

MESSINA.

It is not improbable that Messina, which was one of the chief points in Sicily where the revolution first declared itself, will soon have to stand the brunt of war. Indeed, a report was current the early part of the week that Garibaldi had set his troops in motion for attacking the town, where, as is well known, the Neapolitan forces have been for some time consolidating themselves. Letters from Naples state that the Royal force at Messina has been raised to 20,000 men, and that its commander has been instructed to act strictly on the defensive, advice which, there is little doubt, will have his entire acquiescence. According to the latest information from Sicily there are three columns which are on their way through the island—one which, proceeding by the seashore, tends towards Messina; the second, which passes right through the heart of the country, to Catania; and a third, which traverses the island in a southerly direction from Palermo to Girgenti, and then will unite with the second. Behind these three columns is Garibaldi, organising new divisions and new reserves at Palermo.

Messina is situated on the north-east coast, opposite to Calabria, from which it is separated by the Channel of the Faro, here about four miles wide. The town of Messina is built partly on the slope of a steep hill, and partly along the seashore at the foot of it. The port is formed by a strip of sandy beach projecting into the sea at the south side of the city, and sweeping round in the form of a semicircle. On this narrow tract of land are the citadel, the lazaretto, the lighthouse, and the castle of Salvatore at the entrance of the harbour, which faces the north. The larger part of the town rises in the form of a crescent, on the west side of the harbour, which is more than two miles in circumference, and is one of the best in the Mediterranean. The view over the channel, the opposite coast of Calabria, with its towns and villages, and the lofty Apennines behind them, and, on the other side, the low promontory of Fiore, with its tower, advancing into the sea as if to meet the Italian coast, form a splendid landscape, which is one of the finest even in that classic sea, whose shores are remarkable for a variety of beautiful scenery.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY'S SHOW AT CANTERBURY.—SEE SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 45.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

In four weeks the year will have reached the 12th of August. A Session of Parliament extending up to that time is abnormal, exceeding that date, it is so altogether anomalous to be as nearly as possible unconstitutional. When, therefore, you count the time left for the remaining business of the Session by days—that is, days on which work is or can be done—you have just twenty more available. The Bankruptcy Bill is to be passed (there are only 540 clauses in it) through both Houses, says the Premier; the Chinn war is on the tapis; the loan for fortifications is impending; important items of the Budget are yet untouched; the Civil Service Estimates have had pinches of money on account taken out of them, that's all; at least one debate on foreign affairs is imminent; and the question of privilege as to reports of speeches and Committees is to be raised in a resolution form by a hybrid metropolitan member. All this in twenty days. To be sure, gentlemen representatives have not been oppressed with heat as yet, and the Thames still runs inoffensively on the sand facilities and Lungs of dwellers on its muddy banks, so that the ordinary exhaustion of July cannot be pleaded. Nevertheless, so little disposition in the absentees is there to stick to business that in the Session—one can almost say—of the month about the House has made it as good a place of resort in the evenings as any club in London—have counts out and attempts at counting out been so frequent as this year. On Tuesday no less than four attempts to keep a House were made, one at the morning sitting. It is to be remarked that, when efforts to count fail, the failures are revenged by an awful sitting into the next morning.

However, this matter is recurrent, and progresses one out of place. The great debate on the privilege question would of itself demand notice, even if it were not almost the only feature of the past week's history. The House was well filled on the evening that the debate took a place under the gallery by half-past four. Mr. Gladstone was prompt in his attendance, looking pale, and with a nervous manner in which you might read strange matters. He flung himself back into his seat, closed his eyes, and assumed that motionless, corpselike appearance which, in the case of a man when he suffers, is the expressed emotion. He scarcely seemed to move a muscle during the two hours' speaking. The sense of pain, or of nervous suspense and physical energy—in which Lord Palmerston apparently left his Chancellor of the Exchequer stranded. With a magnifying glass peering on one side, I have detected a slight quiver about Mr. Gladstone's mouth as the Opposition cheers rang out at each sentence of Mr. Disraeli's speech, and we might have said the phantom of a moan from his lips as his leader declared that the best justification of the Government of which he was the change of opinion as expressed by votes of the Commons between the second and third reading of the Paper Duty Bill. In a very short time it was evident that the House was going to be kept steady for a night not a man often moved after Mr. Collier had delivered his exhaustive speech, which ensures him a high position among the hard-and-dry speakers of the Legislature. It should have been said that all this time Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Whiteside whispered and smiled together, and it seemed as if their eyes were fixed on the face of Mr. Gladstone, as though to see if he raised himself up, caught the expression of their faces, and came back to them, as he had accepted the ball to open as well as close the address. The debate was fast dying away, the House was thinned, Mr. Vincent Scully was yoone in vain, Mr. Lushan spoke to the clerks and reporters, and it was clear that the Opposition proposed to prevent the question from being put, one of those manifestations across against which the Government has always a right to fight, which are not to be accounted for by any tendency to boredom on his part, for he seldom speaks, and never long, but which probably arise from an air of exhaustion in the Opposition, and-sickness of the question which he exhibits, and whereon he is unconsciously comic. Laughter, and ironical cheering and volleys pointed cynical remarks, however, went out with a bang like a firework. Human nature, and, above all, Gladstonian human nature, could stand it no longer, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was on his legs again. He was rich in the full power of voice and a concentrated slowness of speech which sounded almost terrible from him. He was fierce, decorous in his language, and chief as a recreant and a renegade, and his taunts at the wild-allied Opposition who had accepted Mr. Disraeli's bribe of power and representative, pro hâc vice, were withering in their tone, though the words were measured, and the eye did not flash, but glazed on them with the directness and steadiness of a rifle. Mr. Disraeli had never met fifty numbers in the House. Mr. Disraeli had gone to dinner, which he does with great regularity as a gourmand, and had left at the commencement of the process of restoration, precisely at half-past seven. For a little while Lord John Manners took notes; but if he intended to make a speech of form that he had not acted weighty enough to contend with the tremendous broadside of the first-rate opponent. It may be imagined you could hear the cry of Mr. Disraeli, and handed him his paper of memoranda. It did not, however, suit the latter to go into action half-dined, and with the immediate retort to Mr. Whiteside, who had heard the whole speech of Mr. Disraeli, and was ready, of course, always to be on the top of anything in the shape of speech which may consist of educated and reliably grounded information-slate. At first he really seemed as if he was about to be guilty of good taste and speaking, and was going on without being coarse; but nature and peculiar mental training prevailed, as usual, and he fell into the attack which, under the most popular prize of the blatant-bothering order, has created for him the reputation of being a powerful-effective speaker. At one time he rose to such a height as to induce Mr. Gladstone to rise and leave the House.

The next feature of the debate, such as it was, may be taken to be Mr. Stansfeld's speech, which, having a little pomposity, was very good; and it was to his credit as an advantage to a young member of speaking after ten o'clock to a full House. Up to this time his best address had come from the Opposition. It was getting late, and it was approved. Last night Mr. Stansfeld fell into the trap which presented himself with a confident air, and with reason, for as a mere speech his was as good as any that had been made. He fun and sarcasm made no genuine, without being bitter, that at last even Mr. Gladstone's grim countenance relaxed and he fairly laughed out. It was expected that Mr. Horsman's character would be damaged the divisions, but the old John Russell rose, he, with a pat perceptible shrug of the shoulders, resumed the seat from which he had risen. Mr. Horsman's speech, with his usual feebleness and "squirrelity" (to coin a word from Moore's characteristic), was as squirrel-minded", enhanced by a synchial affection and the lingering of Mr. Bright's cold in the head, he said? But for Mr. Bright having missed his chance, looking to the evident exhaustion of the House, it is doubtful whether the debate would have been adjourned. When the next evening arrived it was observed that Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli were sitting together (which is not usual), and engaged in what appeared to be friendly conversation, affectionate and free. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, therefore, was delivered in consequence of the rumour that the good-natured Premier had given him a letter of license to make any use of the House he would refuse to the man being king him a request with his free-trade admirers; in short, that in the Cabinet a personal policy had been adopted something like that ingenious arrangement which enabled the civil wars in Scotland when a father espoused one side and a son another, in order that he estates might be saved to the family whichever party succeeded. When the discussion on the privilege question was resumed on Friday evening the House was exhausted by the operation of going debauched, and jolly debates on a dozen and a half subjects brought forward on the notice for adjournment to Monday; and they were not inclined to listen with much sympathy to the arguments already adduced by Mr. Collier, delivered by another speaker mildly, languidly, and with such rapidity and rousing continuity that he made no pause indicated by a comma. But they did come together on Monday, and Mr. Horsman, and they got their reward in the form of a surprise. Few could have expected that the gentleman who, a few days ago, took a line of Parliamentary policy which entitled him to a designation which was in vogue just then—namely, that of a destructive, would now elaborately argue on the length of asserting that the House of for Lords ought to be the chief estate of the realm, and implore a jury Providence to preserve that august assembly as a bulwark against the doe-ctrine of democracy, and the watchmen of the national guns against the Pullingering doings of the Commons representatives of the taxpayer. When one remembers Mr. Horsman's organised crusade against Peers spiritual, and looks to his present secondary condition of mind, one would not be astonished if next year he were found producing essays composed of sentences which sound like translations from the French of Vergniaud, and which always give one the idea of their delivery being wonderful efforts of memory—to prove that things are not what they are, and that the fact is the fact, which has come in episcopal hands. The first and last speech of the night was Mr. Hadfield's, which, with a Sheffield accent, a slight lisp, gaily affected his voice, and accounted for a certain moderation of style, rather than excess of style, which is the fault of Sheffield. Undoubtedly he gave no notion of an intention of drawing the sword against the Lords, and still less of throwing away the scabbard; perhaps he will be the first Parliamentary reporter and Liberal platform.

It seems by this time as if the House as a body was anxious to get rid of this business; it had culminated to a sham, and all the splutter of that collection of little men who have gained for themselves the ironical title of the Independent Party, and who appear to be incapable of carry the farce on any further. To be sure, a legal member who probably has some business with Mr. Collier, a man officially under the Gladstone regime which is supposed to be looming in the very far distance, and therefore is willing to give up his chances of a County Court district, and Mr. Bouverie, a dismissed Lord of Treasury and divided on a verbal amendment to one of the resolutions; and a puny attempt was made to adjourn the House once more, but was crushed by more weight of numbers. The moral of the whole affair was palpably present to the minds of all the House, and was in such further than a second time. Mr. Gladstone was to open this occasion with that the real battle was to be fought. The time and the place are indicated clearly enough, nevertheless.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

THE NAVAL DISCIPLINE BILL.—The Duke of SOMERSET moved its second reading. He explained that the object of the Bill was to introduce changes in the present law, but to regulate a number of minor offences, and to consolidate the whole into one measure. It was, in short, simply an attempt to bring the law of the present day, which was framed more than a century ago, into accordance with the present state of things.

The report of amendments on the Criminal Lunatic Bill was received.

The Law and Equity Bill was passed through Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

VOLUNTEERING IN IRELAND.—In answer to Mr. Vance, Mr. S. HERBERT said that the Irish Volunteers had to keep their arms clean, and were disposed in the same manner as the English Volunteers.

THE BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY SALARIES BILL.—On the motion for the consideration of the report of this Bill, Mr. HUNT objected to the course he would state the course he proposed to take to remedy the mischief done by the House in passing the Bill. He would move the omission of the clause in the bill. The object of the bill was to relieve the suitors in bankruptcy from a large amount of fees, which were to be in future levied entirely by Act of Parliament were to be transferred from the fee fund of the Court of Bankruptcy to the Consolidated Fund. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated two months; but he added that unless the opposition he had received from gentlemen on the other side of the House, and from the representatives of the great commercial community, was abated, he must give up the bill. He proposed to have the salaries of the officers of the Court of Bankruptcy to be paid to them by the bill on the Consolidated Fund, and to make them all £1,000 a year. Mr. CHILDERS said that the House in the course of the present session would bring £3,000 into the Consolidated Fund. He should leave the compensation to the Commissioners, to report, as amended by the House. The House then went into Committee on the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, a new clause was moved at the 26th clause. Several clauses were agreed to after some discussion.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS IN SYRIA.—The Earl of DERBY called the attention to the massacres of Christians which were taking place in Syria. He could not help thinking that the present was a favourable moment of the Turkish Empire, inhabited by half-civilised tribes; and during the time that the Sultan's power was at its lowest ebb, he should have thought would be treated than now. In May an attack was made by the Druses on a place near Beyrout, inhabited by Christians, and a massacre of the most horrible nature perpetrated, and since similar acts of violence had occurred in other places. He understood that the Porte was willing to do its duty, and was prepared to put down so would interfere to do so; and a like interference was naturally to be expected from the Powers of Europe. He trusted that the British Government should take some decided course in the matter, with a view to bring the Porte and the Powers of Europe to act in concert, and to interfere with all the other Powers of Europe. He asked whether any official accounts of this fearful massacre had been received by the Government. If the Government had taken steps singly or in concert with other Powers to protect British subjects, or Syrian subjects in general. It was stated that France was about to the Turkish Ambassador that France was prepared to interfere.—Lord WODEHOUSE said that he had not seen the telegraphic despatches or the statements of his noble friend. The Ambassadors at Constantinople met some days ago, and determined to urge the Turkish Government to act with vigour, and then Fuad Pacha had been sent to Commissioner to Syria, and troops had been despatched from Constantinople. The Government had sent orders to Admiral Martin to proceed with his squadron to the coast of Syria, to protect British subjects, French and Sardinian troops had been sent to Beyrout. The British Government was in communication with all the other Powers on the subject. He was not aware that Fuad Pacha had made the statement to the Turkish Ambassador alluded to by his noble friend.

THE TURKISH LOAN AND THE AUSTRIAN CONCORDAT.—Lord BROUGHAM, through the Bankruptcy Committee-viz., The Naval Discipline, Railway Cheap Trains, &c., Augmentation of Small Benefices, Universities' and Colleges Estates Bill, and the Phœnix Park Bill were read a second time.

The Local Boards of Health Bill and the Cathedrals Act Amendment Bill were read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

AT a morning sitting the Bankruptcy Act Amendment Bill passed through Committee.

The Bankruptcy Salaries Bill was also proceeded with in Committee, but little progress had been made when the sitting was suspended.

THE MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS IN SYRIA.—In the evening sitting, in answer to Lord C. Hamilton, Lord J. RUSSELL said that he had received official intelligence of the massacre of Christians in Damascus and Syria, and was quite as extensive as were reported in the newspapers. Fuad Pach and a body of troops had been sent to Syria by the Turkish Government. The British Government had directed Admiral Martin to proceed with a squadron to the coast of Syria for the protection of British subjects.

THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.—In answer to Sir J. Shelley, Lord PALMERSTON said that no plan had been submitted to the Government for the defence of Dover required for the China war, and the mode in which it would be provided for; but he would be glad to receive any plan for the protection of that important port. He proposed to raise for the erection of fortifications in accordance with the report of the Committee of Defence a loan of £3,000,000.

THE WHITWORTH GUN.—In answer to Mr. Dodson, Mr. S. HERBERT said it was not true that the Government had ordered 100 guns from Mr. Whitworth's gun.

THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION.—Mr. COCHRANE moved an address to the Crown, praying that the officers, marines, and seamen of the fleet serving in the Abyssinian war might receive the Victoria Cross.—Lord C. HAMILTON opposed to extra pay and allowance.—After some discussion the motion was withdrawn.

VOTES OF CREDIT (RETROSPECTIVE) BILL.—The House went into Committee on the Gas (Metropolis) Bill.—Mr. STANLAND opposed the bill on the ground of the injurious tendency of the measure to the interests of the gas companies and to introduce an inquisitorial system of inspection. He moved that the Chairman do leave the chair.—Mr. S. BETCROFT, as Chairman of a select Committee which had considered the subject, defended the bill, and suggested that it should be referred to that Committee.—Sir C. LEMON thought that the suggestion was a judicious one, and urged its acceptance.—After some debate the Chairman left the chair, on the understanding that the bill be referred to a Select Committee.

The Civil List Pensions Bill passed through Committee pro forma.

The Smithfield Markets, Streets, and Improvements Bill passed through Committee.—Mr. HUNT moved the second reading of the Bankruptcy Act (private bills.—On a division the motion was rejected by 112 to 69.

The House then went into Committee on the Roman Catholic Charities Bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

THE CENSUS.

The House went into Committee on the Census (England) Bill.

The first three clauses were agreed to.

On the 4th clause, which provides for a declaration of the religious profession of each person enumerated,

Mr. HARDYS moved the omission of the words in question from the clause, pointing out that the feeling of the Dissenting body was to be gathered from the vast number of petitions which had been presented against it, and protesting against an enactment which was so much opposed to the strong religious sentiments of a large body of the people of this country.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said that the plan now proposed was adopted in all civilised countries except Austria, and had been adopted in the case of one of our colonies. A return of the kind had been made in 1834, in Ireland, under a Royal Commission, without an Act of Parliament, and the numbers of every religious denomination had aided in carrying it out. He pointed out that the objection of the Dissenters was not to the matter now proposed to be done by answering a return, while the present plan was intended to correct the imperfections and fallacies of former returns. He was convinced that the value of the return would in a great degree depended on the voluntary co-operation of the people. He had received from the Registrar-General a statement that the religious-profession column would operate, not merely to render the religious returns, but the general returns, imperfect and fallacious. Under the circumstances, he trusted a formal sentiment was resumed in a large body of persons against the clause, he was not prepared to accept it.

Mr. B. OSBORNE characterised Sir G. C. Lewis's speech as calculated to excite all parties; and, instead of attempting to remove the feeling the clause, he had concluded by withdrawing it. He objected to the motion which had been hinted at of introducing the question by means of taking the census of France and Prussia. He denied the right of the Government to inquire into the religious profession of any person in this country.

Mr. Henley and Mr. Marsh having spoken,

Lord R. CECIL said that the members of the Church of England would not complain of the giving up of this clause. He saw no business that the State had to inquire into any religious opinions, but the result of such an inquiry would show that previous statistics of this kind were too favourable to Dissenters, and that they were not entitled to the claims to be based on the proposal which would have brought out.

A discussion followed, in the course of which much disapproval was expressed with Sir G. C. Lewis's speech.

Mr. MONSELL would like to see provision for taking a religious Census would be retained for Ireland, where such objections as had been made in England did not exist.

Mr. CARDWELL said it was the wish in Ireland that such a Census should be taken, and it would be necessary to insert a clause to that effect in the bill for Ireland.

Sir J. PAKINGTON expressed his regret that no religious Census was to be taken. He could not really understand the objection which the Dissenters entertained to the proposal. Surely they were not to be set down as Churchmen in a man's being asked what his religious profession was; and he was driven to suspect in the opposition to the proposal that the result of the examination which was not objected to by any other body of Christians, which would show that they were not so numerous as they had been in the habit of supposing at the last Census.

Lord PALMERSTON said Sir G. Lewis had been unjustly accused of casting reflections on the dissenting body. Even Mr. Baines had himself shown that religious statistics were fallacious, and he thought that the Government ought agreed in putting into the Census Bill a religious enumeration, and he denied that it had already any large bearing on this question; and he knew such an inquiry could be construed into an affront to persons of any denomination. He thought that the Bill, as it stood, was free from all unreasonable one. Nothing could have been more fallacious than the plan suggested in the Census Bill of 1851, and he trusted that the proposal to Nonconformist objection was so widely spread, and, when he found it was so, he thought that such a Government ought to give way on the point to which it was entitled to respect, and therefore he concurred in the withdrawing of the provision.

Mr. WHITESIDE said that the course taken by the Government led him to express a hope that the Government would not withdraw the whole question on their side, but when they had reason on their side they would fail. He urged with some power the unprecedented circumstances would know that the Established Church was not a sect; and the best proof of its being an overwhelming majority was the fact that it was the State Church of Census. He objected to insert this provision in the Irish Census Bill, because such a measure ought to be confined to the Census of England.

After a short further discussion, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILDERS moved the omission of the 5th clause, the religious clause.

Sir G. C. LEWIS, in objecting to the amendment, took occasion to vindicate himself against the charge of having made unfounded and unnecessary attacks on both.

The amendment was negatived, and the clause, as amended, was agreed to.

The other clauses were passed, and the House resumed.

The House then went into Committee on the Irish Census Bill, which was agreed to, the religious profession clause being retained.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

THE STATE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—The Earl of DERBY gave notice that on that day week he should move a resolution on the state of public business. He added that his remarks would not be of a party character, but would be simply directed to the present inconvenient state of public business.

THE JEWS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—On the motion of Lord LYNDHURST, this bill was read a second time. He said, with the view of introducing some amendments into it.

THE TURKISH LOAN QUESTION.—Lord BROUGHAM, in the course of a conversation that took place on this bill, expressed his opinion that that House had an undoubted right, and was in expect to amend any bill coming to from the other House, whether such bill be one for the imposition or the repeal of a tax. He also expressed his opinion that the Government had an undoubted right to impose a bill enacting a tax and to send it down for the assent of the other House of Parliament. He hoped that the Government would not be intimidated by their Lordships to act upon their rights.

The following bills passed through Committee—viz., The Naval Discipline, Railway Cheap Trains, &c., Augmentation of Small Benefices, Universities' and Colleges Estates Bill, and the Phœnix Park Bill.—The Bankruptcy Amendment Supplemental Bill.

The Endowed Schools and the Local Taxation Returns Bill were read a second time.

The Australian Union Harbour Bill and the Law and Equity Bill were read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at twelve o'clock.—The House went into Committee upon the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill. the discussion of the clauses of which occupied the whole of the morning sitting.

The House resumed at six o'clock.

THE ASSIGNMENT OF THE GALWAY CONTRACT.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply to Mr. Corry, said that an arrangement had been made, subject to the assent of the Legislature, for the transfer of the contract of the Galway contract of the Montreal and Ocean Steam-packet Company. A copy of the assignment, he believed, would be laid on the table to-morrow, that a reply immediately was necessary. The Government replied that they could not sanction the application, but that the matter, in reply to Mr. Corry, the matter was under consideration.—In reply to Mr. Roebuck, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the Government had received a telegraphic despatch which stated that "the Galway contract having been transferred to the Montreal Ocean Steam-packet Company, the Galway line, which, with the Galway, will call at Galway for the Newfoundland, United States', and Canadian Mails." It was published without any comment by the Government, and the pledge which was given to Mr. Lumsan, as the representative of the Liverpool and Philadelphia Steam-packet Company, was not violated.

THE MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS IN SYRIA.—Sir C. NAPIER called attention to the massacres of Christians in Syria, and to the conduct of Fuad Pacha, and asked the Government to state what course they intended to take as to the matter.—Lord J. RUSSELL said that information had been received him was to the effect that the whole amounts of Turkish troops in Syria was 60 or 70 thousand men, independently of irregulars. Large reinforcements had been sent them, which, with the English and foreign ships on the coast, would be sufficient to put down effectually any riots. They were also collected in sufficient force to protect Damascus from any attack that might be made upon it.

ANNEXATION OF SICILY TO SARDINIA.

Sir R. PEEL moved for copies or extracts of papers relating to the threatened annexation of Sicily to Sardinia.—Lord J. RUSSELL expressed his regret at her Majesty's Government as to the probable demands of France consequent upon the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, and asked whether her Majesty's Government have within the last few weeks intimated to the Government in Paris that the annexation of Sicily to the kingdom of Sardinia would not be viewed with indifference by Great Britain. The hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) had in the course of his speech spoken of the Italian question in 1848, and if they were justified at that time they were still more to the assertions of Lord Palmerston in 1848 that it was a question of humanity and a commercial point of view; and, therefore, we ought not to allow the island of Sicily to fall into the hands of any Potentate who might thereby become the arbiter of those seas. He believed that the maintenance of the maritime supremacy in the Mediterranean was of so much importance to us as the maintenance of our supremacy in St. George's Channel. He, therefore, wished the noble Lord distinctly to state what course her Majesty's Government intended to pursue in relation to those matters. He did not wish to say anything against the policy of the Sardinian Government that as he supposed his following changed their cry from "Vive l'Italie!" to "Vive Victor Emmanuel!" placed himself at the disposal of the King of Sardinia instead of, Sardinia. He considered the Sicilians to be careful how they were about to act, and how they transferred their allegiance to the King of Italy. He pointed to his late conduct in transferring Savoy and Nice to France, and asked whether the Monarch who could barter away 300,000 of his free and independent people was the man in whom the millions could place confidence? Having received the vote of confidence for the last sixty or seventy years, he acknowledged that he did not himself deserve it. He had not been a faithful guardian, but he hoped that the Government would be considered responsible for the annexation of Sicily to Naples.

Lord J. Russell said he was at a loss to know what the hon. Baronet desired. The Government system, tried so long by Austria, and afterwards by Naples, had proved to be an entire failure, and the people of that country were determined to have nothing with some other country to protect them from the tyranny and misrule to which they had hitherto been unhappily subjected for ages. His Majesty's Government had watched the Neapolitan Government that their rule existed in Sicily and Naples, but they had not, but they regretted it.

Conference had been suggested to them to make to the people, but the Government had uniformly refused to accept it, as they were of opinion that Intervention could come upon Power, her Majesty's Government had nothing to propose to the House. The noble Lord declined to enter into any discussion from the charge of filibustering. The people of Sicily had determined to choose for themselves the form of government which they would accept from a foreign Power had a right to interfere with them. If they decided on annexation to Sardinia the Government would not put any difficulties in the way. The concessions offered by the King of Naples had come too late, and he could not now, by concession, offer better terms than those which the people had had given him by the British Government.

Mr. Layard hoped to know whether the Government were prepared to remit in a policy which would keep every small Power on the Rhine in a continual state of frightened?

After a few words from Mr. Whitside,

Mr. Monsell complained that the noble Lord had not answered the question of his hon. friend (Sir R. Peel) namely, what course her Majesty's Government intended to pursue in the event of Sicily being annexed to Sardinia?

After some further discussion the motion was withdrawn.

The Earl of Derby moved for the bestow for going into Committee of Supply, Sir John Trelawny interposed some comments upon the Abyssinian position," to which, as he considered it premature, he should hereafter present unsatisfactory results of the controversy with the Rajor of Peru on the question of privilege.

SUPPLY.—THE CHINA WAR.

The House then went into Committee of Supply, with

Mr. S. Herbert, in moving for a vote of £3,690,930 to defray the expenses of the China war, explained the circumstances which led to the present state of affairs in that country. The Government had not been unmindful of the necessity for that purpose. A sum of £400,000 amount the Government would require for that purpose. A sum of £400,000 was not responsible for, because it was a time to make any attack upon the Company. He did not think it was a time to make any attack upon the finances of India. He had looked to the Indian Revenue for help, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not found that a large sum was asked for, German was not unwilling to render assistance. He wished to know what had been done, and he had followed that example. The refusal to the assault of the Peiho was at the General who had command on the spot, and who was in a position to form the head of the war party in China, and it was not in relation to the Emperor of China was very distasteful to him. Therefore, until the English could strike some blow that would bring the hostile Court to terms, and him into friendly relations, no cause of the policy of the Government of that country being changed.

Mr. T. L. Peacock asked whether there was not a large balance due to the Government of India on account of recruiting, and whether that item was not calculated in the estimate?

Mr. S. Herbert said that recruiting was a separate account, and was not included in the estimate. It was included in the ordinary estimates every year.

Mr. Gladstone, in reply to some observations of Sir H. Willoughby, said it was not until lately the Government became aware of the approximate amount required to carry on the war, and he must say that every succeeding communication on the subject had tended to swell the amount. He believed that they themselves had been deceived in the matter. The information which had been obliged to increase. The right hon. gentleman had referred to the very much the policy of maintaining treaties at the sword's point and the cannon's mouth, but, unfortunately, it was the traditional policy which he was long followed with regard to that country.

Sir J. Pakington thought the Government ought to give more information before it asked for so large a vote. In February last the Government were in possession of the ground upon which this war was founded, and they had had time to consider the matter in the leisurely manner of the taxation of the country.

Lord J. Russell defended the policy of the Government with regard to China, and also the course pursued with regard to the Pekin.

After some remarks from Mr. Cobden and Mr. Mackinnon, the Chairman reported progress.

The House soon after adjourned.

THE THEATRES.

Haymarket.—On Wednesday night Mr. Buckstone's annual benefit took place, and attracted an audience that filled the house to overflowing. The entertainments consisted of a new comedietta by Mr. Charles Selby, entitled Sunshine through Clouds, a new farce in a divertissement, and the farce "The Happiest Day of My Life." Of the first of these, which is entirely "Mrs. Crowley," it is only necessary to say that it is evidently of French origin, and that the fun of the piece turns upon the expedients adopted by the footman of a certain Prince Ambassador at Naples to prevent a marriage between the Plenipotentiary's daughter and a young Frenchman. The weight of the comedietta rests upon Mr. Charles Mathews, who, as a Parisianised, lying knave, is Leporello or a Figaro, acts admirably, and insures the success of the trifle. After the divertissement Mr. Buckstone, whose first appearance it is to-night was the signal for a perfect storm of applause, delivered an appropriate address.

Princess.—On Monday a new farce was produced, entitled "Bewitched Footmen by Mr. J. Oxenford, which will display the humours of Mr. Widdicomb, and succeeds admirably. That grotesque actor supports the character of a hypocrite named Versuley, and the scene of the piece consists of the apartments taken for his exposure, in order to prevent his marriage with a young lady whom upon honourable and sacred ties he is determined to wed. Widdicomb Maxwell as at last made drunk, a situation which Mr. Widdicomb interprets with irresistible comic effect. The curtain fell to great applause.

Olympic.—"Duchess or Nothing" is the name of a new piece taken from the French, in which Mrs. Stirling undertakes the character of the duchess for the nonce, and succeeds in it quite admirably, acting with a degree of brilliancy surprising even to the warmest of her friends. The piece is a free adaptation of "Le Marquise de Barbas," in which a charming widow assumes the name of the Duchesse de Boisset in order to disabuse the mind of the Marquis of divers prejudices and stupid babbles, that he has got from a melodrama. The part calls upon the actress for much finesse and dexterity, and consequently the more successful it is in the execution. The author of the piece performs also a part in it; Mr. W. Gordon, as the Prince de Conti, whose lines he can act as well as write. The drama is capitally mounted with new scenery, costumes, and decorative accessories.

Mr. Alfred Francis on Tuesday gave a reading of "Hamlet" to a select party at his house in Bryanston-street, Portman-square, to which the press was invited, as the commencement of a series of dramatic lectures. Mr. Francis has studied many of the best delineators of Shakspeare. His voice has great compass and power, and he may vary it to suit the circumstances. His Hamlet, Ophelia, and Polonius were respectively distinguished; so thoroughly indeed, that they could be readily discriminated without repetition of the name. Altogether the experiment may be very successful, and we should be pleased to find that this style of real drawing-room entertainment met with encouragement.

* Life-boat Services.—It appears that during the terrific gales of the few months that have passed of the present year the life-boats in connection with the Royal National Life-boat Institution have been instrumental in rescuing one hundred and fifteen of our fellow-creatures from a watery grave. Of this number eighty-six were conveyed to the shore in those valuable engines safely into harbour; and their crews have assembled in rough weather more than once, so as to be ready to render assistance to vessels in distress. Nearly all the services of the life-boats took place, as usual, during stormy weather, and the crews have undergone all the dark hours of the night; yet not a single accident happened either to the crews or the boats.—The Life-boat Journal.

Windsor Royal Association.—The annual meeting and dramatical exhibition of this excellent association took place on Thursday week in the Home Park. The society was established by the Prince Consort, not for the purpose of relief, but specially to reward the industrious and well-deserving classes who have distinguished themselves by bringing up a family in honest and industrious habits without parish relief, except in special cases of sickness; families distinguished for cleanliness and tidiness in house and person; widows and married servants, for long periods in one service, for their labourers, of good moral character; for best collection of vegetables, or the best specimens of needlework, bee-hunting, cheese-making, poultry-rearing, cabinet-making, and other specimens of cottage handicraft or economy—this prizes varying from £5 to 5s. 6d.

MUSIC.

The two Italian Opera Houses are preparing to close their doors. At Her Majesty's Theatre Tuesday was "the last night of the subscription and the last night of the season," but a series of "extra nights at reduced prices" has been announced, and began on Thursday last, when "Don Giovanni" was performed. How long these extra nights will continue to exhibit the same attraction for the public, we suppose, will depend on their success. That they will last for some time may be inferred from the fact that Mdme. Marie Cabel, one of the stars of the Opera Comique is only just arrived, and made her first appearance this week in "Don Giovanni." Mdlle. Titiens at Covent Garden announces the present is said to be "the last week but three of the season" and, therefore, we may conclude that the theatre will close by the first week of August. The opening of the Court having left London the "season" may be regarded as being, in fact, at an end.

As the London season draws to a close musical people throughout the country begin to inquire with considerable interest what are their prospects of entertainment for the autumn. This is a subject we are able to give our readers some information. In the first place, the two great provincial music-meetings of the year will be the Worcester Festival, in the week of the Three Choirs,"), and the Norwich festival, both in September next. At both these festivals Mdme. Clara Novello will be engaged. Mr. Sims Reeves has also arranged to operate provincial tour, to commence in September. Grisi and Mario are to be the principal singers in the tour with which Mr. Lumley purposes to delight the provinces during the autumn. These incidents, although not of the first importance, still the brightest ornaments of the Italian stage, have shone this season with unusual brilliancy. At no former period of their public career have they been more attractive, or contributed more, by their splendid performances, to the success of the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. Lumley, in the engagement of these distinguished impresario has organised another provincial tour to begin on the 1st of October. The principal towns to be visited are Liverpool, and other principal towns in England, Scotland, and Ireland. This tour will have the great and peculiar interest that it will afford the opportunity of hearing, for the first time, the Queen of English singers, Clara Novello—an opportunity which no longer exists in the metropolis. It will be a consolation to know that it is her adopted country the Countess Gigliucci (Mdme. Clara Novello no longer) will enjoy the wealth and happiness, the rank and station she so well qualified to adorn.

There has been at the Crystal Palace a monster competition of brass bands open to the whole country early last year. The prizes for the best performances, consisting of sums of money, silver cups, and musical instruments were given by the Crystal Palace Company, the Duke of Cambridge, and other gentlemen resident in London. To give an idea of the enormous scale of this contest, we may mention that 1,500 bands, or more than one-half of the brass bands, from all parts of England, and numbering about two thousand performers, took part in it. The bands first played separately in the large area of the Palace, the judges placing themselves at their best, and then the whole assembled in the great Handel festival orchestra, when Costa's "Waking Dream," Mr. Land's "Rule Britannia," "Hallelujah Chorus," "Rule Britannia," "God Save the Queen," and other pieces; accompanied on a monster gong-drum, seven feet diameter, manufactured expressly for the occasion by Mr. Potter, of Aldersgate-street, were performed by the whole body. The effect of two thousand brazen instruments was something absolutely astounding; it seemed as if the very building would be lifted from its foundations and carried away, and the audience of having the drums of their ears broken. But the music of brass bands is not to be heard to the best advantage in such a place as the Crystal Palace; and such a competition as the present cannot fail to have a considerable effect in promoting its improvement.

Mr. Balfe gave a concert at the Royal Surrey Gardens on Wednesday evening—the first of a series of three which have been announced. The weather was unfavourable, and rain fell at the very instant. The magnificent music-hall was crowded to overflowing; and multitudes who could not obtain admission thronged their promenading in the beautiful grounds, and trying, from time to time, to catch a few of the sounds that were going on within. The concert consisted chiefly of Mr. Balfe's own compositions, and was interspersed pieces from his operas, intermixed with favourite ballads—with one exception, that of Mr. Wallace's "The Maiden's Prayer," composed expressly for this occasion, and sung by Mr. Sims Reeves. This song was the cause of one of those rows which of late have been too frequent at concerts, and which are disgraceful to the public taste. Mr. Reeves accordingly began to repeat it; but this was not what a portion of the audience wanted. They called for encores for "My Pretty Jane," "The Death of Nelson," and other things which they desired to hear; and Mr. Reeves, instead of complying with this demand, was hissed by them, while the orchestra, which was in an outrageous storm of shouting, yelling, hooting, and other noises. Mr. Balfe attempted to restore order, and succeeded for a time; but again came forward, and began to repeat "The British Volunteer," when being assailed with the same uproar as before, he came again back his bow and withdrew. After a scene of noise and clamour which lasted half an hour, Mr. Reeves appeared a third time, and sang "The British Volunteer" to the end. Then you'll remember me," which stood in the programme, and with which the clamourers chose to be satisfied. Mr. Reeves was received with the most enthusiastic cheers; nobody had any title to make, and he ought to have been supported in his firmness by the reasonable people, who surely must have formed the great majority of the audience.

The London Glee and Madrigal Union, the society which, under the direction of Mr. Land, has so highly distinguished itself during the past season, will commence its series of Public Meetings at Beale's provincial tour in October next, together with the celebrated pianist, Leopold de Meyer.

A grand Jullien festival will take place at the Surrey Gardens on the 21st of September next. The object of this entertainment is to aid in the funds already erected for the family of the deceased composer. Selections from the works of Jullien, as well as new compositions, will form the festival, which will embrace the talents of a large number of the leading members of the musical profession, all of whom give their services gratuitously. At their head is Mr. Sims Reeves.

Recall of General Harney from San Juan.—Some correspondence explanatory of the circumstances which have led to the recall of General Harney from the command in San Juan, and to the evacuation of that Island, has been laid on the table of the House of Commons. The first despatch is one from Lord Lyons to Lord J. Russell, dated London, 30th June, enclosing Harney's proceedings, and inclosing a copy of that person's orders, written at the head-quarters in Oregon, and addressed to the officer commanding the detachment of American troops stationed at San Juan. In those orders General Harney directs the British Company's naval forces in the Pacific, one forwarded a copy of this document to Lord Lyons, who lost no time in addressing a remonstrance to the American Government. On June 6, we are happy to state, he was able to transmit a copy of a most satisfactory despatch which he had received from General Cass, the American Secretary of State. This high functionary frankly admits that General Harney's proceedings were in direct violation of the arrangement which was made by his predecessor, General Scott, and he further states that General Harney has been recalled, and his instructions have been sent to the commander of the United States naval forces on the Pacific station, with directions to deal with the question in a calm and friendly spirit.

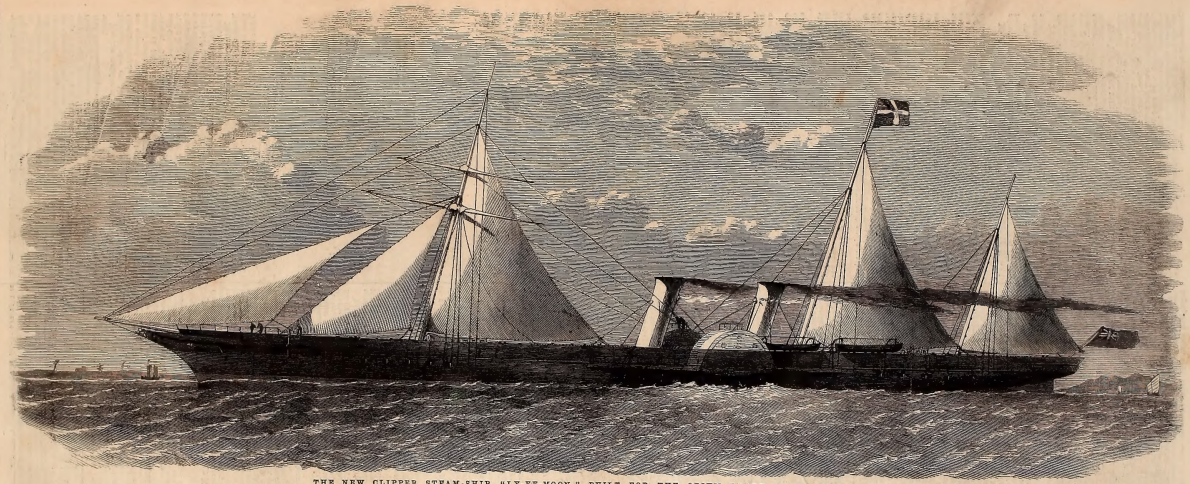
On Thursday week a melancholy accident occurred on the Mersey, by which a man, named Simon Peacock, and his son, a boy about ten or twelve years of age, lost their lives.

LITERATURE AND ART.

Mr. Kinglake, in the inimitable, although often imitated, "Eothen," describes the word "aha!" as an exclamation very frequently written, but seldom if ever uttered aloud. On the same principle we once heard an eminent medical man declare that people, however wretched they might be, never sighed unless they were suffering from indigestion. With all due deference to the great sages who tell us that horrible nightmares must in the main be attributed to hot suppers, and that five out of ten cases of insanity are only caused by the heat of the sun, we beg to differ. In the first place, we may be permitted to express the opinion that very many persons besides "Hamlet the Dane" have, over and over again, given audience to the ghosts of their dead selves, and communed with it, perchance, the name of "poor Yorick," when speaking of the late Thomas Hood. Before us lie the graceful and touching "Memorials" of him who sang "The Song of the Shirt," edited by his son and daughter. What a melancholy picture of the life of a facile principium does it give of sayings and cracker of jokes! Almost the last wood-block on which he ever drew contained a jest on his own hopeless illness. A group of mourners were dejectedly rummaging over some apothecaries' phials, and beneath was the quotation, "Throw physic to the dogs." "Alas! poor Yorick," and "Alas! poor Thomas Hood," indeed. Theodore Hook had his troubles, Charles Mathews was tetchy and nervous, and Grimaldi was at times half hypochondriacal; but all these princes of Momus' Court were, up to an advanced period of life, hale and hearty men. Thomas Hood had to struggle from first to last against the demon of ill-health. He was always ailing; and in this aspect his life-struggle reminds us of the poor friend whose demise we last week recorded. Little could the crowded audiences who were wont to roar at the fun of "The Enchanted Isle," and "Trivandrum, the Siege of Seringapatam," have had the slightest idea that author was one of the sickliest of mortals—"a miserable man," like the knight in "Cristabel." Robert Brough had his flashes of social merriment at times, but his existence was, in fact, but a long and long disease. He died so young to prove, as it were, how ill he had always been. The quantity of work he got through, considering his feeble constitution, was enormous; and although much was written to save the pot boiling, he has left behind him a name that will reach "posterity," as Milton has it, "will not willingly let die." A volume of his poems will, we hear, be produced under the superintendence of his brother. The Rev. Dr. Maginn, the friend and pupil of Mr. Hollingshead, as has been erroneously reported; and we trust that amongst other selected writings poor Robert Brough's exquisite lyrics, "A story from Boccaccio," "The Tentmakers Story," "Godiva," and "Doctor Johnson's fairy tale," will not be omitted.

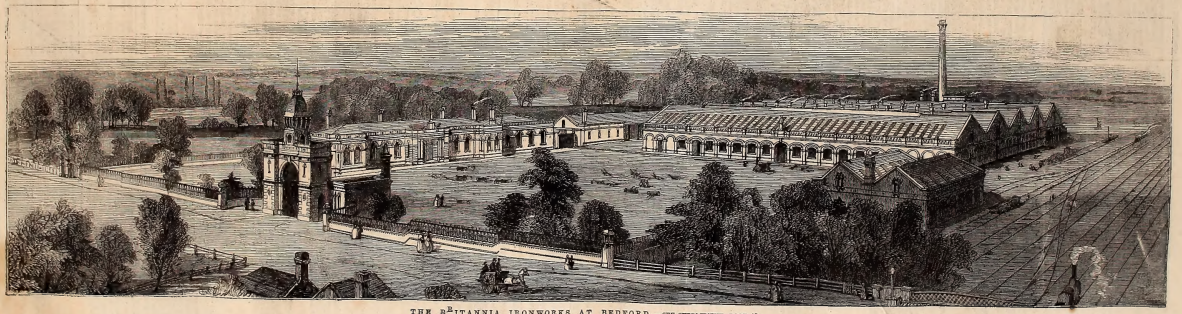
It is but seldom that a critic—and a critic alone—is honoured with a posthumous memorial. Who would propose so to raise a statue to the late John Wilson Croker? Lord Macaulay, or Lord Lucius Cuffe Malone, have had no monumental cans niation. We are glad to perceive, however, that the erudite and accomplished critic on art, the late Mrs. Jameson, is to have a bust in the South Kensington Museum. The wherewithal is to be raised by public subscription, and the sculptor is to be Mr. John Gibson, R.A.

The mention of the great Roman statuary's name reminds us that the Crystal Palace Company have just added to the collection of the Edinburgh Quarterly, whose mission it should be to watch over the introduction of new words and locutions into the Anglo-Saxon language. The new nationality is to be called "Crystal Palace Company." The idea is quite thrown into the shade by the specification of a wondrous cubical crate, which is to contain the "Colossal Reasons" which we suspect that the adherents of Pleoplonism are believers in the political virtues of a certain Prince of the Imperial family who resides at the Palais Royal. We are glad to see that the Company has given the Queen's to follow Captain Cuttle's advice, and, "when found, make a note of it. As for the Reasons themselves, they have long since been the task of enumerating them. How are we to criticise a language which contains such dialectics as the following, lately culled from a northern journal:—"The struggle between the ultra-Protestants and the Anglos platform unless a plank is inserted, giving free pass to the Lecidipton Establishment Bill, will result in a split." Reasons of this description the Rosetta inscription in abstruse wordiness.



It seems that we are to have more and more art-unions. The old original Art-Union, with its many abuses and imposing list of vice-presidents, does not satisfy some young and impulsive art-lovers; and we see that a new Art-Union, with Mr. Henry Graves for its progress, Mr. Bell Smith, of the Portland Gallery, acting as secretary. The juvenile Art-Union has already the season £250 to spend. We don't profess to know the merits of these new Art-Union picture lotteries; we can only join in an aspiration of "the more the merrier," and express a hope that the movement will not end in the ruin of Great Britain may be the gainers in the long run.

There are to be published during the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, and not one hundred of them have as yet passed through Committee. Of course the usual "massacre of the innocents," or "felonious act of Parliament," "engaging" "Punch" "Jerrold," and the Times has called Addison's exquisite allegory of the bridge in the "Tatler" to mind, in connection with the wholesale disappearance of nascent measures. Well; we must wait and hope, we presume, till our legislators can find time to give a few bills that concern literature a little "look in." There is a bill in existence that is invaluable "little bill" for securing artistic copyright, in pictures as well as in engravings. We hope to see the time when the unfortunate sons of the first artists in the kingdom are watching over the interests of this justly-called-for enactment—never more necessary than at the present moment, when swaggering Prussia has set up as a photographer and takes greater liberties with other people's property than even that Power has been accused of.



Mega biblion, mega bakon—we spare "the letters Cadmus gave" in indicting the quotation—says the Greek proverb. Be it so, we say, with all our heart. Is it? Are the envious people declared when Jeremy Taylor published the "Doctor Dubitantium," and when Sir Richard Blackmore poured into the world a very fourteen quarto volumes. But were not Doyle and Cahuet's Dictionaries, the Encyclopedia of Diderot and d'Alembert, Johnson's Dictionary, Chambers's Encyclopedia, Rees's and Full's of Gibbon, all big, and the biggest of books? Be it as it may, the era of large volumes seems to have to have declined, and it is but rarely that we see the giant folio looming in the future. Such a colossal undertaking, however, bids fair to be the vast work of Herman, Adolphe, and Robert de Schlagintweit, to which we alluded some time back, and which is to contain a record of the scientific mission of these three erudite and adventurous brothers in India and Central Asia. Brockhause of Leipsic, and Trubner of London, are to be the sponsors to this important literary enterprise. The work is to consist of nine volumes of imperial 8vo text, and an atlas in three volumes folio, containing maps and views. Of the Atlas her Majesty has graciously accepted the dedication.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Liverpool meeting was very much favoured in point of weather, but still Mr. Topham did not receive the support he is so richly entitled to. The Two-year-old Plate produced a splendid act-to between Dundee and Brown Duchess, the crack two-year-old colt and filly of the season, and the fiat was in favour of the former, who grew stiffer, for his size, by a short neck. Underhand changed his tactics, and made the running in the Queen's Plate, where Master Bagot, Jack Spring, and Petra had no chance with him; and the Irish crack, Druid, could do nothing at the weights with Mocrocco for the Cup. The Southampton, Nottingham, Canterbury, Lichfield, Cambridgeshire, Chesterfield, Hunstanton, Hereford, Marlborough, and Edinburgh meetings all come on en masse next week.

The two matches of Gentlemen v. Players have produced some most brilliant play on the part of the latter, and the style in which Carpenter made 134 at the Oval, and Hayward 85, at Lord's, deserve an especial notice in the annals of the willow. John Lillywhite was also in rare batting form on both occasions. In the three previous contests of 1845, 1848, and 1858, the Gentlemen were uniformly the victors. The Lord's matches for next week are, on Monday, the M.C.C. and Ground v. Cobbett's Cubs: and on Thursday, the Household Brigade v. the Royal Artillery. On Monday, Surrey v. Sussex (return) is the fixture at Brighton, and on the same day the Gentlemen of Kent play the Gentlemen of Berkshire at Sittingbourne. The All England play eighteen of the Hallam Club at Hyde Park, Sheffield, on Monday; and on Thursday the Two Brothers play for Martingell's benefit at the Oval.

CRICKET.—The Gentlemen of England v. The Players: Play in this extraordinary match was resumed about noon last Saturday, and brought to a close at five o'clock, the Players going in for their second wickets. The following is the score of this extraordinary run-getting match, whereing 21 runs were made in the last of 22 wicketings: Although a little over 24 runs per wicket, the Gentlemen making 403 runs for 20 wickets, or about 20 runs per wicket, and the Players 403 runs for 22 wickets, or 24 runs per wicket:—Players, first innings, 328; second innings, 89. Gentlemen, first innings, 134; second innings, 269.

The Household Brigade v. I Zingari: To witness this match at Lord's Ground on Thursday week a very numerous and fashionable company assembled. It was only a one-day match, and the batting on both sides was first-rate, as the following scores will show:—Household Brigade, 201; Zingari, 181.

The annual Lord's' Gentlemen and Players match began at Lord's Ground on Monday, and was brought to a close on Tuesday. The Players went in first innings, and had 190 runs to spare. The Players took the first innings, and scored 381; the Gentlemen scored first innings, 191; and in the second only 76.

Gentlemen of the Surrey Club v. the Gentlemen of the Midland Counties: This match was concluded on Tuesday at the Surrey Ground, Kennington Oval. The following are the scores:—Surrey, 1st innings, 231; second innings, 74. Midland, 1st innings, 142; second innings, 228.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Government have decided on repairing the existing fortifications and erecting additional defences at the island of St. Helena, in order to keep at sixty or possible fewer regiments.

The Duke of Cambridge will, as Colonel of the Scots Fusilier Guards, inspect the battalions of that regiment of Guards this (Saturday) morning in Hyde Park.

The dépôt of the 12th Lancers left Leeds, on Monday, to join the head-quarters at York, and are to be succeeded in the former town by the same regiment.

Some sharp operations, on a very extensive scale, in which the whole of the troops of the garrison will be engaged, will take place at Chatham during the present summer, active preparations being in progress for the event.

It is expected that the Duke of Cambridge, as General Commanding-in-Chief, will make an inspection of the Irish battalions of the Grenadier Guards, at present quartered in the metropolis, in the course of the ensuing week.

The operation of cutting in two a line-of-battle ship took place at Chatham Dockyard last Saturday morning, the vessel thus operated upon being the Nile, now the Sans Pareil. Many persons were on board for seeing the process of being converted into a screw-steamer. The operation was successfully effected by Mr. Lang, without accident of any kind, in the most scientific persons being present.

THE MILITARY ORGANISATION COMMITTEE met again yesterday week for the further consideration of their report. "From all we hear," says the Army and Navy Gazette, "there is not likely to be any serious decision respecting the larger questions upon which the recommendations of the committee are based; but we believe that the Government will be given to what ought to be the respective duties of the Secretary of State for War and the Commander-in-Chief, as well as their relative position towards each other. At present the commission of the Secretary of State exempts from his jurisdiction the discipline and patronage of the Army, and we are not inclined to anticipate that this exception will not be permitted to continue. The effect of this will be to make the Commander-in-Chief practically the minister and subordinate of the Minister responsible for the conduct of the department."

MILITIA SURGEONS.—Yesterday week Mr. Sidney Herbert received a deputation to present a requisition, signed by forty-seven members and one hundred and nine members of Parliament, directing his attention to the injurious operation of the militia surgeons' regulations, and praying for justice and propriety of placing these gentlemen in a more remunerative and satisfactory position.

Much sympathy has been shown in Sweden for Garibaldi, and a fund collected for his use at Gothenburg has reached the sum of 2,000*l.*, including the gross receipts of a soirée, which produced 160 thalers.

The Directors of the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company have definitively assigned their contract to the Canadian Government. The assignment has, however, undergone but one fundamental change.

THE MEDAL executed by Mr. Joseph Wyon to commemorate the opening of the Victoria Bridge in Canada by the Prince of Wales is simple but striking in design. On one side is a view of the bridge, the river, and on the other the Prince of Wales's plume, surrounded by maple-branches, and on the edge the words "Victoria Jubilee Bridge opened August 25th, 1860." The medal has been executed by order of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and there have been struck in gold, 100; in silver, 1,000; and a hundred in bronze.

THE WRECK OF THE "MALABAR."—The divers at Galle have recovered from the wreck of the Malabar a small quantity of luggage, money which are cases containing her Majesty's autograph letter to the Emperor of China, Lord Elgin's credentials and instructions, and his orders of the Tuesday and the Bath. The letter is legible, though much discoloured, while the credentials are in very fair preservation. Some more boxes are recovered of "papers," which would never be considered literally, as the ink is all but obliterated. The autograph letter of the Emperor is a shapeless mass of pulp formed by the salt water and the lodge, the opium and oil, the coal-dust and filth, wherein it has been submerged. By a portion which was damaged said by auction for a mere song.

ARRIVAL OF THE "GREAT EASTERN" AT NEW YORK.—The Great Eastern, which left Southampton on the morning of the 17th, reached New York on the 28th, having, consequently, made the voyage in eleven days. Her greatest speed with the screw alone was thirteen and three-quarter knots an hour, and the greatest distance run by her in any one day was three hundred and forty-three miles. Immense crowds assembled to witness her arrival in New York harbour, and she was welcomed with great enthusiasm. Her vessel the Battery was in attendance. No difficulty was experienced in entering the bar, and the immense ship wound her way through the bay as easily as a pilot-boat. The passage attended by a fleet of small craft, and the enthusiasm of the crowds on board them, and the immense throng at the Battery and on the various piers, was indescribable. Mr. Bidder, the engineer, was received by a hot honour. She was decked with flags from bow to stern. She moved very rapidly up the North River. The rest of the passage was performed in safety with her. The frigate Niagara, lying in the stream, looked very small in comparison. She had on board the Prince of Wales's party, and a large allowance of at least two hours an hour should be made on that account. The distance from Sandy Hook lighthouse to the Battery is twenty-six miles, and on the ice, she went further south. The following is the number of miles made per day:—First day, 211; 2nd day, 280; 3rd day, 276; 4th, 304; 22nd 289; 23rd, 302; 24th, 299; 25th, 225; 26th, 333; 27th, 234.

In the Vice-Chancellor's Court recently a learned counsel, who appeared for the purpose of moving for the appointment of a receiver of certain property, stated that one of the persons who might have joined in the petition was a Quakeress, and that, in consequence, he should not be required to take an oath, but to affirm, and pray for the appointment.

The Queen's Bench Prison has effected an important capture of a personage living in the highest style in one of the great hotels of that city, but whose chief income was derived from cashing bogus Napoleon's slightly gild over the large profits he was performed by a publicity, and the receipt of bills. Both these motives have acknowledged their crime, and given up their implements of trade.

Dr. Bernais, of Kentucky, has found that ten per cent of the deaf and dumb, from one end of the United States to the other, are also admitted into the various charitable institutions of the United States are the sons of immigrant Irishmen. These unions are now prohibited in certain states, and especially in Kentucky.

Mr. Daniel Maude, the new magistrate at Greenwich, was on Saturday sworn in before the Lord Chief Justice of England, at Manchester, on his retirement from the office of police magistrate of that city. The unanimous testimonial of a taxpayer, in remote, and five pieces of silver plate, value about £400.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

IT having been ensured that Government is about to raise a loan of four or six millions, the effect has been to depress the value of money, and nearly all home securities have ruled very inactive during the week, and prices have fluctuated considerably. The Bank of England has not yet raised its rate of discount, but continued activity in the demand for capital for commercial purposes. The Bank Directors have, however, resolved to raise the rate of discount upon the value of money, acting, we presume, from the heavy repayments made to the Bank of England by the Government, which will be due in the course of the three months, at 4 four months, at 5 to 4½; and six months, at 4½ to 5 per cent, at which rate the Bank will probably discount.

The half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the Union Bank of London has passed off pleasantly, and the report, which declares a dividend at the rate of 12*s.* per share was adopted, with only one dissentient. It may be remarked that, since the Bank has been under the very able management of Mr. Bank has steadily increased, the current and other deposits having risen to £3,740,518.

The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company have paid to the shareholders £200,000 on passage from Australia and New York. The bulk of the business, we are informed, is done by the Australian line, and the profits derived in the exchanges, is expected to be taken for the Continent.

Several of the Railway Companies' Boards of Directors have postponed the gradual conversion into Five per Cent Securities of all the Bonds not closed under the Act of last Session, which amount to £8,000,000 bonds at 2,3/8,000,000 Stocks, and the annual interest is 99,500,000 Stocks.

The Australian Banks have declared dividends on their trade; but the liabilities of the firms are small.

The Railway Shares of the newly-formed companies have been only moderate. Ocean Marine Insurance have realised 11 to 11 prem.; Thames Ironworks, 1 to 1 prem.; Universal Marine, 1 to 1 prem.; Universal Mutual Provincial Marine, 2 to 2 dis.; South Eastern Railway of Portugal, 1 to 1 prem.; Tudor and Rhondda Valley, 1 to 1 prem.

The steamer for India has no bullion on board; and the demand for silver has ruled very moderate at 61¼*d.* per ounce standard.

On Monday English Stocks were inactive, and prices showed a tendency to favour the buyer. Consols for Money and for the Account, 92¾ to 93 Account, 93¼ the Reduced and New Three per Cents marked 93¾ 4 India Five per Cents, 103 4 Ditto, Four and a-Half per Cents, 101 2 Ditto, Four per Cents, cheaper Bills, par to ¼*s.* prem.; India Stock was done at 218 to 220 ex div.; Bank Stock, 220 to 222; India Bonds, 1*s.* to 2*s.* prem. On Tuesday the transactions on Tuesday were trifling, and the market closed as follow:— Bank Stock, 220 to 222; India Stock, 218 to 220; India Bonds, 1*s.* to 2*s.* prem. for transfer, 93¼ 3; Ditto, for Account, 93¼ 3; India Stock, 219; Ditto, Five per Cent. On the following day the market was very heavy, and the market was very flat:—Bank Stock left off at 220; Reduced, 93¾ 3; New Three per Cents, 93¾ 3; India Stock, 218 to 220; India Five per Cents, 93 to 95¾; India Stock, 219 to 220; India Five per Cents, 103¼; Ditto Five per Cents, 103¼; Ditto, Four and a-Half per Cents, 101 2; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1858, 99½; Ditto, 1859, 99¾; Ditto, Bonds, 4*s.* to 7*s.* dis.; Exchequer Bills, 1*s.* to 2*s.* prem. On Thursday the transactions were limited in the quotations, and the market was steady:—Consols, for Money, were done at 93¼ 3; Reduced, 93¾ 3; New Three per Cents, 93¾ 3; India Stock, 218 to 220; India Five per Cents, 104¼ ½; and Exchequer Bills, 1*s.* dis. to 2*s.* prem. India Bonds were done at 1*s.* to 2*s.* prem. Bank Stock, 220 to 222.

Owing to the unhappy events in Syria, Turkish Securities have been very flat, and prices have declined. Spanish Stock, however, from the favourable report published by the Minister of Finance, which shows a surplus revenue of 2,000,000*l.* sterling, and that the Government Loan and other obligations have had an upward tendency. In most other foreign bonds a steady business has been transacted, and prices have been firm. Five per Cents, 1858, 99½; Spanish Half per Cents, 1852, 38¾; Ditto, 1858, 38¼; Ditto, 1859, 37¾; Danish Three per Cents, 1853, 69¾; Ditto, 1858, 69¾; Ditto, 1859, 69¾; Dutch Two per Cents, 1853, 69¾; Ditto, 1858, 69¾; Ditto, 1859, 69¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 54¾; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1858, 99½; Ditto, 1859, 99¾; Ditto, Bonds, 4*s.* to 7*s.* dis.; Exchequer Bills, 1*s.* to 2*s.* prem. On the following day the market was very heavy, and prices declined:—Spanish Half per Cents, 38¾; Ditto, 1858, 38¼; Ditto, 1859, 37¾; Danish Three per Cents, 69¾; Ditto, 1858, 69¾; Ditto, 1859, 69¾; Dutch Two per Cents, 69¾; Ditto, 1858, 69¾; Ditto, 1859, 69¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 54¾; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1858, 99½; Ditto, 1859, 99¾; Ditto, Bonds, 4*s.* to 7*s.* dis.; Exchequer Bills, 1*s.* to 2*s.* prem. On Friday the market was very heavy, and prices declined:—Spanish Half per Cents, 38¾; Ditto, 1858, 38¼; Ditto, 1859, 37¾; Danish Three per Cents, 69¾; Ditto, 1858, 69¾; Ditto, 1859, 69¾; Dutch Two per Cents, 69¾; Ditto, 1858, 69¾; Ditto, 1859, 69¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 54¾; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1858, 99½; Ditto, 1859, 99¾; Ditto, Bonds, 4*s.* to 7*s.* dis.; Exchequer Bills, 1*s.* to 2*s.* prem.

Railway Shares have continued very moderate. Those of the Union Bank of London have fluctuated considerably; otherwise, no material change has occurred in the value of the leading shares. Caledonians have realised 79¼; Bank of Egypt, 2¼; British North American, 52¼; City, 20¼; Colonial Government Securities have been in moderate request, and the quotations generally, have ruled firm. Cape Stock, 103 5; Ceylon, 101 2; and upward, have sold at 78¼ ex div.; Nova Scotia Six per Cents, 104¼; and Victoria Six per Cents, 104¾.

In the value of Miscellaneous Securities there is little change to report. The market for them, however, is still far from active. The Seventeen-and-a-Half per Cent Preference Shares of the Great Ship Company have improved from par to ½ prem. Australian Agricultural have been done at 23¾; Canada Land, 117 ex div.; Crystal Palace, 2½; Ditto, Six per Cent Perpetual Debentures, 100 1; Ditto, Six per Cent Debentures, 1865, 100 1; East India Docks, 130 ex div.; Imperial Continental Gas Association, 47¾; London General Omnibus, 1¼; London Discount, 2½; Netherland Land, Buildings, and Canal, 1¼; Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation, 2¼; Royal Mail Steam, 3½; South Australian Land, 3¼ ex div.; Birmingham Canal, 94½; Regent's, 22¾ ex div.; Chelsea Waterworks, 30 ex div.; East London, 124 ex div.; Grand Junction, 101½; Lambeth, 100½; Southwark Bridge, 2¾.

The amount of business doing in the Railway Share Market has been limited, compared with the previous week, and, in many instances, the quotations have had a decided tendency, although the traffic receipts continue tolerably good. Annexed are Thursday's official closing prices and quotations:—

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, July 9.—Our market to-day was sensibly supplied with English wheat; nevertheless, the demand for that article was extremely dull, at a decline of 1*s.* per quarter on last week. A good deal of foreign wheat was offered, but met in nothing was doing, at barely late rates. Floating cargoes of grain were a dull inquiry, at previous quotations. Barley was in limited request, at 1*s.* per quarter less money. Malt was a slow sale, at 2*s.* per quarter lower. Beans and peas were unchanged in value. Flour was dull, at 1*s.* per quarter less money.

July 11.—No change from prices last week in any kind of produce to-day. Generally speaking, the trade was dull.

PORTRAIT OF GARIBALDI.

We have this week the pleasure of presenting an Engraving, by permission of the owner of the copyright, of the remarkably fine portrait of Garibaldi, the champion of Italian liberties, painted by M. Orsani, of the existence of which we made a brief mention a week or two ago. This portrait, which has been painted from actual sittings, and has been acknowledged and approved by the hero himself, on coming to this country found its way into the hands of Messrs. H. Graves and Co., who, although they have since parted with the original, have reserved the right of publication, and are preparing a steel engraving from it, which may shortly be expected to appear. The picture is striking from the extreme simplicity of the treatment—neither of the hands being seen, no attempt at attitudinising being dreamed of—all the interest being centred in the noble head, with its fine expanse of forehead, intelligent, thoughtful eye, and that firm mouth, which seems to have been made to command and to inspire confidence, as it compels ready obedience. The General is habited in a green uniform, with the Italian tricolour sash thrown across the shoulders, at the back of which loosely hangs a fur cloak.

A recent traveller in Italy writes as follows of Garibaldi's personal appearance:—"There is a singular likeness between Omar Pacha and Garibaldi. Garibaldi, whose age is fifty-two, is about 5 ft. 9 or 10 in. in height, well made, and evidently no stranger to fatigue: his head is a remarkable one, and unquestionably indicative of intellect, his hair being fair, it becoming grey does not exhibit that change, while the thick beard and moustache covering the lower part of his face are scarcely tinged with grey as yet. The more striking peculiarities of the General's feature are the eyes, by no means prominent, and the almost uninterrupted line formed by the nose with the forehead. The expression of the face is essentially calm, and appears that of one 'more in thought than anger.' What he may look like when roused may best be described by those who have seen him, but when in repose there is great serenity in his countenance and a quiet contrasting with the noise and good humour of the firesters who are around him. He wears light grey pantaloons, with a red cotton shirt, fastened by five small mother-of-pearl buttons, and a silk handkerchief with different colours on a violet ground lightly tied by two knots on his left shoulder, the other two ends hanging loosely over his right. His hat is of the kind called in Italy "pajuolo," of the colour of camel's hair, but so worn and battered that many a man without the pretensions to a dandy would have considerable objections to such an article of costume. It is, in plain English, 'a shocking bad hat.' He does not wear any sword, at least at present. He walks with a step so rapid that his youngest sides-de-camp have the greatest difficulty in keeping up with him. This quickness of step images the quickness of all his movements, military or political, as the course of the present expedition proves."

GENERAL GARIBALDI.—FROM A PORTRAIT BY ORSANI.

MANŒUVRES AT LUNEVILLE.

THE greater portion of the cavalry in the military district of Nancy, under the command of Marshal Canrobert, is at present quartered at Luneville, in the barracks of the Orangery, which is admirably adapted for the reception of a large number of horse soldiers. Much attention is now being paid to the exercises of the French cavalry, who are to be trained to fight on foot with nearly the same facility as on horseback. A series of manœuvres recently took place on the Champ de Mars, in Paris, with this object, and they are to be practised perseveringly during the sojourn of the troops at Luneville and at the Camp of Chalons. We intend very shortly to give some views of Châlons, to which we have despatched an Artist and a Correspondent, the latter of whom will furnish us with some account of the new, or rather newly-revived, system of training cavalry to fight occasionally on foot; for the ancient dragoons (a term derived from the German word tragen, to carry) were rather a sort of mounted infantry than cavalry, properly speaking. Our little Sketch of the Plain of Luneville represents a charge of the Cuirassiers of the Imperial Guard, who form, perhaps, the most picturesque as well as the most formidable portion of the French heavy cavalry. On the occasion depicted in our Engraving the troops were under the command of General Daumas, Marshal Canrobert having been detained at his head-quarters at Nancy.

Luneville is a town of 16,000 inhabitants, picturesquely situated at the confluence of the Rivers Vezouze and Meurthe. It is about eighteen miles distant from Nancy, and derives its name from Lunæ Villa, the City of the Moon, so called from the worship formerly paid to Diana on a neighbouring mountain. From the tenth century this town has frequently been remarkable as the scene of important historical events. It was here that in 1801 the French Republic signed the famous treaty with Austria, generally known as the Peace of Luneville, by which the Rhine frontier was given to the former and the possession of the Venetian States to the latter. The extent of the Champ de Mars, shown in our Engraving, and on which the cavalry will manœuvre and exercise during the coming season, is nearly five hundred acres.

THE MEETING OF THE NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION.

The great rifle-shooting match was inaugurated, as detailed in our last impression, on Monday week, on Wimbledon-common, in the presence of several thousand spectators. The Queen attended in state; her Majesty being accompanied by the Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, Prince Arthur, Princesses Alice and Helena, and the Dukes of Cambridge and Saxe-Gotha. Shortly after the arrival of the Royal party, Mr. Sidney Herbert, accompanied by Lord Elcho, the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, and other members of the council of the Rifle Association, presented an address to her Majesty requesting one of the objects for which the match was held. This portion of the inaugural ceremony formed the subject of the illustration on the first page of our present Number. Her Majesty made a most gracious reply. A second address was presented to the Prince Consort, and his Royal Highness, in his reply, expressed the pleasure he felt in witnessing the skill of such marksmen. Then her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, advanced along the narrow walk to the rifle-butts. The bugle sounded, the rifles were raised to the trigger, and the "first shot" was fired that announced the opening of the competition. The red and white flags were hoisted, when it terminated for the day, a salute of artillery indicating both the commencement and the finish to the outer world.

The rifle contest, which continued throughout the week, was brought to a close on Saturday last, the event of that day being the struggle for the Queen's prize of £250 and the gold medal of the association. The competition was severe, and was in the highest degree creditable to the competitors. The Stairs were not permitted to enter for the prize, the object of securing the "blue ribbon," as it has been termed, being confined to volunteers. The winner of the enviable prize was Mr. Edward Ross, of the North York, who had previously carried off a Martini-Henry rifle and two other prizes—£35 and £20. Lord Fielding, Flintshire, followed close on his heels, scoring 21 points to Ross's 24; the other competitors score gradating off to zero.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

Our first great national gathering of sharpshooters was brought to a conclusion on Monday, when the well-earned prizes gained by the successful competitors were distributed at the Crystal Palace, in the presence of 50,000 spectators. The chair was taken by Earl De Grey and Ripon, who acted as a substitute for Mr. Sidney Herbert, the president of the association, who was prevented from attending by business in the House of Commons. The prizes were distributed according to the following list, commencing with the smallest in value and concluding with the £250 given by her Majesty and the gold medal of the association—the winners in each competition being called up in the inverse order to the number of points made:—

No. 1. A Volunteer Rifle, given by Mr. Fairbairn, shot for by the Swiss at 500 yards, 5 rounds with any rifle. Won by Thorel, of Geneva. The winner shot with a Whitworth rifle—9 points.

No. 2. Swiss Rifle, given by the Swiss, and shot for by the volunteers who competed for the Whitworth rifles (the 40 who shot for her Majesty's prize excepted); 5 rounds at 500 yards. Won by Deaz, 3rd Middlesex—7 points.

No. 3. Prize of £50 given by His Grace the Duke of Wellington, for the best shot not at 1000 yards, with Whitworth rifle, which was added, as a second prize, a watch, given by Mr. Bennett, value £25. Duke of Wellington's prize, won by Lieut. Archibald, Instructor of Musketry at Hythe. The winner shot with Westley Richards' breech-loader—3 points. Mr. Bennett's prize, won by Knecht, of Zurich, with Westley Richards' breech-loader—3 points.

No. 4. Mr. Gyn's Prizes for Volunteers, 5 rounds at 200, 500, and 600 yards, £200 distributed as follows:—1st prize, £100, won by Wyman, 3rd Kent—29 points; 2nd prize, £50, won by Hartford, St. George's Volunteers—19 points; and 3rd prize, £25, won by Robertson, 1st Sutherland Rifles—12 points. Then, with prize, £10, 9 1st Lanark—18 points; and 5th prize, £20, won by Murray, 1st Peebleshire—18 points—Ten.

No. 5. Mr. Alderman Salomon's Prize of £50, for breech-loaders 5 rounds at 800 and 5 rounds at 1000 yards; to which were added three prizes of rifles, value £30, £20, and £11 11s., given by Mr. Westley Richards. Won by Rose, of Cambridge. Prize won by Knecht, of Zurich—19 points; Mr. W. Richards' £30, won by Lieut. Lacy, 1st Rangers—16 points; Lieut. Archibald's £20, won by Pringle—16 points; ditto £11 11s., won by Edwards, 4th West York—8 points. The whole of these prizes were won with Westley Richards' breech-loaders.

No. 6. All Comers.—1st Set, 200 yards, 5 rounds.—Given by—1. Lord Vernon, Rifle, value £25, won by Pike, Cambridge—12 points. 2. N.R.A., £20, won by Newman, Royal Marines—12. 3. Archibald, Scottish Caledonian Guards—7. 4. N.R.A., £40, won by Dove, 3rd Lanarkshire—7. 5. N.R.A., £40, won by Peters, 2nd Devonshire—7. 6. Mr. Lancaster's rifle, won by Peter, Geneva—7. 7. Mr. Lancaster's rifle, won by Roth, Geneva—6.

4th Set, 800 yards, 5 rounds.—Given by—1. N.R.A., £50, won by Captain Rowland, 55th Regiment—6 points. 2. N.R.A., £50, won by Wyatt, Royal Marines—6. 3. N.R.A., £50, won by Lieut. Archibald, 2nd Lanarkshire—6. 4. N.R.A., £50, won by Holloway, 5th Gloucester—6. 5. N.R.A., £50, won by Sadler, 10th Sussex—6. Array and Navy Gazette, £30, won by Cocks, St. George's—6. Mr. Lancaster's rifle, won by Corporal Hodder, 2nd battalion Grenadier Guards—4. This prize was not finished shooting, Mr. Lancaster having to send the rifle and Corporal Hodder, having been called up to the dais, had to descend with an incomplete score of the two ranges he had shot.

5th Set. Prince Consort's Prize of £100, shot for by all comers who qualified at the preceding ranges of 200, 500, 600, and 800 yards; first at 800 and 600 yards, 10 rounds at each range. Second Stage Prize—1st London Rifle Brigade Cup, value £52 10s. Third Prize—Mr. E. Ross's Rifle, value £25. Fourth Prize—Lieutenant Peter, 9 1st Lieutenant Lacy, 12th Regiment, Instructor of Musketry—22 points. 2nd prize, won by Sergeant Lawley, 2nd Derby Volunteers—18 points. 3rd prize, won by Lieutenant Dillon—16 points.

No. 7. Volunteer Prizes.—Twenty Whitworth Rifles and Silver Medal of the Association, shot for by the association, for with long Enfield, five rounds at 800, 900, and 600 yards.—Winners in order of merit—1. Sharp, 9th Sussex—17 points. 2. Henry, City of Edinburgh—15. 3. Ross, 7th North Riding—14. 4. West York—13. 5. North York—13. 6. Foot, 5th Kent—10. 6. Burgh, 10th Gloucester—5. 7. May, 5th Sussex—15. 8. Baker, Bristol—14. 9. Lord Fielding, Flintshire—14. 10. Jackson, 32nd Kent—14. 11. Jenkins, 5th Glamorgan—14. 12. Cocks, St. George's—14. 13. Wood, Edinburgh—14. 14. Ross, 7th North York—13.

His Majesty's Prize, £250, and Gold Medal of the Association, to the twenty winners as above, and twenty next best shots at 800, 900, and 1000 yards, 10 rounds at each distance with Whitworth's rifles—1. Ross, 7th North York—24 points.

Each winner as he came up was loudly cheered, but the ovation to Captain Ross was the most cordial and enthusiastic. Ross was warmly congratulated by his conferees, both English and Swiss. The proceedings were closed by a short address from Lord Elcho.

The company then adjourned to the grounds, where for several hours the band of the Coldstream Guards played on the lawn. Sunshine played in five o'clock, and the scene in the gardens during the evening was magnificent.

At eight o'clock the volunteers gave a dinner to their Swiss competitors, at which Lord Elcho presided; and when, after justice had been done to the excellent fare provided by Mr. Mayall, the choicest cuisine had provided, mutual congratulations, commingled with patriotic and fraternal toasts, were exchanged.

LORD CANNING'S RETURN VISIT TO THE MAHARAJAH OF CASHMERE.

An interesting interview took place at Sealkote on the 9th of March between the Maharajah Runbeer Singh and Lord Canning, the Governor-General, on his return from a flying visit to Peshawur.

Maharajah Runbeer Singh is the son of the well-known Maharajah Ghulab Singh, who, by the treaty of Lahore, Cashmere was ceded over by treaty by the British Government, when the whole of the Punjaub was by the same treaty annexed, in 1846, after the victories of Lord Gough and Lord Hardinge. He has one son, a boy of eight years old, who bears the name of Ram Singh, and is the present heir to the Maharajah Runbeer Singh sent a force to co-operate with the British Army before Delhi, and throughout proved himself to be a staunch supporter of the British Government.

The Maharajah was honoured with a private audience by the Viceroy on a previous day, and also attended the Grand Durbar, in company with the Derajat chiefs, but the subject of the Sketch is the Viceroy's return visit to his Highness. The Maharajah's young son, Meer Sahib, having expressed a desire to conduct the Governor-General to his father's camp, his Excellency started in his carriage, accompanied by the young Prince, the Secretary to the Government, and his Military Secretary. The Lieut.-Governor of the Punjaub (Sir Robert Montgomery), the Commissioner, and other members of the Staff, followed on other carriages, escorted by the Body Guard of the 2nd Sikhs, the 4th Punjaub Infantry, and the 7th Irregular Cavalry.

About half-way to the camp the Maharajah, on an elephant, met the Viceroy. He then alighted, mounted a led horse, and rode by the side of the carriage, which passed between two long lines of Cashmere troops to the Maharajah's tents, the whole encamping area, whilst the Maharajah's artillery fired a Royal salute. The Maharajah then led his Excellency through a magnificent suite of rooms, opening to the inner or durbar tent, where a golden chair was prepared for the Governor-General as honorary visitor. The interchange of shawls of extraordinary beauty from the Ruler of Cashmere to the Queen was first presented to, and accepted by, the Viceroy in the name of her Majesty. This was followed by offerings on the Governor-General consisting of richly-organised horses, a tent composed of shawls, and a bed of the same substance, the Viceroy's offerings to the Queen of Cashmere territories, which having been presented and accepted, his Excellency addressed the Maharajah as follows:—

"I wish to express my sense of respect to the Maharajah of Cashmere in his own Durbar, and before his own Court, the tanks which, when I had the pleasure of meeting his Highness yesterday in camp, I omitted to ask for the good service rendered by his Highness to the Queen's armies during the late Sepoy Revolt, and to express the thanks which I am sure the Government of that service will long live in the memory of the British Government in India and in England. We have by now, too, that in the sincere desire of her Majesty's Government that his illustrious house may be perpetuated, and that it may prove a blessing to generations yet to come, Maharajah, I earnestly hope that the young Prince his son will grow up to be a worthy ruler of those rich and beautiful territories, and in the meantime, that a worthy successor should fail, the Maharajah his Highness may rely upon a willing disposition to the utmost improvement of her adopted into his house according to its usage and traditions.

The Court of the Maharajah exceeded in numbers and magnificence that of any Cashmere chief who has hitherto attended the camp of the Governor-General.

THE STEAM-CLIPPER "LY-EE-MOON."

This beautiful vessel, which on her trial-trip attained the extraordinary speed of nearly seventeen knots per hour, the greatest yet achieved by any vessel, has just left the Thames on her first voyage destination. She was built by the Thames Shipbuilding Company, from the designs of Mr. James Ash, for Messrs. Dent, of Hong-Kong and other Chinese ports, and is intended for the tea trade. The model of this fine modern improvement has been fully carried out in her build and equipment, and she is rigged schooner-fashion, in the most complete style, in white enamel and gold. She is of 1001 tons measurement, 270 feet long between the perpendiculars, 27 feet 3 inches beam, and 18 feet 6 inches hold. She has oscillating engines of 350-horse power from designs by Mr. William C. Taylor.

THE FARM.

The weeks past, present, and to come form a trio full of incident and interest to breeders, and it is not a little unfortunate that their lot should have fallen on the very third week in June. Thursday was one of the favourite days for the Mr. Bobbin's and Thursday was the 487 17s. 6d., and that of the twenty Waterloo lots, £92 13s. 3d. Of course, the Duke of Richmond's sale at Goodwood (Tuesday) and Waterloo 20th, is call to Third Grand Duke, 165gs. The thirty-fourth anniversary of the Bahraham top-letting on the 20th of June, which was so successful as to realise an average of £23 0s. 8d. for sixty full £2 9s. 2d. below that of the previous year. The agents of the Dukes of Bedford and Richmond, and Lord Radnor, Lord Leicester, and Sondes were present, as well as several foreigners. Sir Thomas Maitland gave 1000 guineas for the first lot, to a Mr. Van Rensselaer, New Jersey (U.S.), 126gs. for another; and 55gs., 51gs. and 50gs. were the other highest figures.

The letting of the Earl of Leicester tups is fixed for Tuesday next, at Holmpierrepont. The Cotswold sales and lettings also fall very thick in that and the following week. Mr. Druce's sale at Eynsham on Wednesday, Mr. W. Lane's on Thursday, and Mr. Robert Gane's on Friday. On Wednesday Mr. Wetherell holds a large sale of purebred shorthorned cows, heifers, and calves, and Mr. Stratford, of Scots, pigs, and Southdowns, at the Banbury Grove Farm, near Watford. Among the Scotch sales are those of Mr. Cochrane on Markaway was the first ball call prize this week at Canterbury, where two heifers by him were also highly commended. Mr. Stratford last the large sales of Shorthorns, in Irishmen's-wife, of Mr. Chaloner's, of Kingsfort, near Kells, in the county of Meath, on Wednesday; and Mr. Lee Steere's, of Ballyarthur, near Arklow, on Friday. Mr. Booth and Towneley blood is to be found; but Mr. Chaloner has used nothing but Booth, and the forty-eight lots in the two days' sales, Lustigwyn, five Baron Warlabys, eleven Hopevells, two Windsors, six Sir Samuels, and four Dr. M'Hales among them. As a bull breeder Mr. Chaloner has had very remarkable success at the Royal Dublin shows.

Queen Hortense and "Partant pour La Syrie."—The opening magnificence of the Empire was the most brilliant period of Hortense's life, and it was then that she composed those graceful and musical compositions which alone would have perpetuated her name. The notion of them breathe a tone of melancholy which seems to accord with her dispossessed affections. "Partant pour la Syrie" was of graver complexion than the rest, and was composed in the Tuileries at the moment when she then foresaw the extent of its future popularity and fame. That song was to be the national air of the time when her own loved son (Napoleon III.) became France's Emperor. It was to make itself heard throughout the whole globe, and was to call men to victory at the Alma and Inkermann, at Solferino and Magenta; was to be the Frenchman's rallying note in peace and war, and, mingling with "God Save the Queen," was to cheer that bond of union which, I trust in God, France and England may never have to break again. There is an edition of Hortense's compositions exquisitely illustrated by drawings of her own."—Sir Bernard Burke's Second Series of "Vicissitudes of Families."

Grosvenor Hotel.—In our Impression of last week the dimensions of the site of the Grosvenor Hotel were given as two hundred feet long by fifty feet wide. They should have been stated to be three hundred feet long by eighty-three feet wide.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Percy F. R. S.; J. W.; and others.—Cambridge Meeting of the British Chess Association.—It appears to be definitively settled that the meeting of the association under the presidency and vice-presidency of Lord Lyttelton and Lord Cremorne, will be held at Cambridge at the end of next month. The local committee are actively engaged in making arrangements, and there is every reason to expect that the gathering of 1860 will equal in interest and success that of the previous year at Oxford.

Metta.—We cannot undertake to answer any more questions to-day.

C. D.—We will probably accept it. Can you not forward fresh copies?

T. Bell, A. Hill, and W. Bell.—Your solutions are correct.

Solvers.—We have received many communications from parties who desire to give notice to be entered for the play at the forthcoming meeting. It is to be hoped they will make some regulations to shorten the duration of the games. The Handbook, which, by-the-by, spares you procrastinated to ten, twelve, and even twenty-four hours each, is perfectly invaluable, and should be in the hands of every player.

T. W. B.—The very useful selection of Problems contained in the Rev. John Miles, of Faversham, Norfolk, was published by subscription. Persons desirous of obtaining copies should apply to the author at once.

J. Halford.—The easiest approach is to take the Bishop with the Rook. If Black then takes the Rook with Knight, you mate with Queen. If Black declines taking the Rook, then mate with the Queen. Many correct solutions, and then, when we had begun to be beaten, more Rook to Q B eq, and Black cannot save the game.

W. T., Oxford and Cambridge Club.—The Problem is published by Bohn, of Yorkstreet, Covent-garden.

Alpha.—We have withheld No. 3, to which you refer, being doubtful of its integrity. It comes to us that if Black play 1. Kt to Q B 3rd, and then 2. Kt to Q B 3rd, mate is impossible in five moves. Be good enough to re-examine the diagram.

CHESS IN LIVERPOOL.

The Liverpool Chess Club has received an important accession lately in the person of Mr. Stanley, an English player of great force, from the United States. In the old chess-paper the Stanley's name and transatlantic reputation is perfectly familiar; but, for the information of the younger school, it may not be amiss to say that more than twenty years ago Mr. Stanley, then a youth, fought his way with incredible rapidity up to the head of the second-class players of this country. Nearly at that time much more formidable than that which claims to to the first rank now, and quitted England to try his fortune in the United States. There, for many years, he held the field, in the name of "Old England," against innumerable opponents, and, while in practice, was never conquered. During that long period he was considered the first writer on chess as well as the best player throughout America, and, perhaps, did as much for the game by his play for the advancement of the game. Some many years Secretary and acting Vice-Consul to Sir John Crampton, he got into difficulties on the Alleged foreign enlistment business, and left the Yankeedom, vas est in the same boat with the Minister and three British Consuls. This mishap and the consequent dead compulsion laid him in a great measure to abandon chess, but he still retained much of his skill. He has now again entered the arena, and, to judge from the specimen game below, appears to need only a few months' practice to become as strong, as he was twenty years ago, and perhaps even stronger.

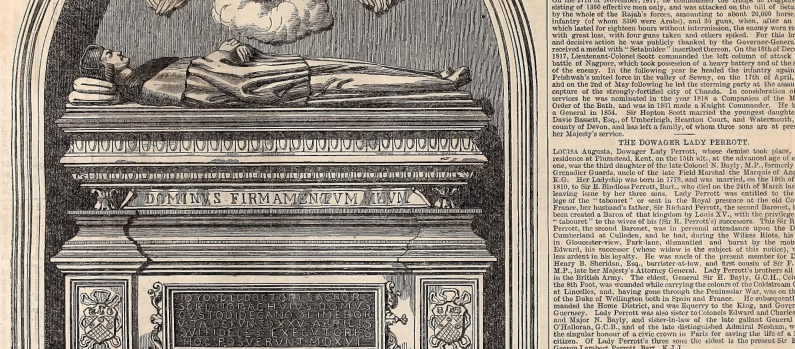
MONUMENT TO DR. YONGE.



AMONG the monuments almost hidden from view in the quaint old Chapel of the Rolls—an edifice now undergoing restoration, and of which we shall have something to say hereafter—is one by no less an artist than Torrigiani, the sculptor of the superb tomb of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey. This monument is to the memory of Dr. John Yonge, who was appointed Master of the Rolls during the reign of Henry VII., and retained the office until his death, in the eighth of Henry VIII. It represents the effigy in a recumbent attitude, habited in a long red robe and deep square cap, the face of the figure being wonderfully fine. In a recess above is a head of Christ, between two cherubim, in bold relief, and beneath the recumbent figure are the following inscriptions :—

Dominus Firmamentum meum.

(On tablet.)
Io. Yong LL Doctori Sacror. Seruliar ac habili domus Custodi. Decano illi. Ebor. Vita defuncto xv. Aprilis: sit Sedes Exercitores hoc posuerunt. MDXVI.

The subject of this memorial, though now forgotten, was a personage of distinguished merit and consideration in his time. From the scanty records of him preserved by Rymer XIII., 344; Paplı L, 720; Newcourt I., 120; and in Beatson's "Political Index," we gather that he was admitted Rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, March, 1502, and collated to the church of St. Mary-le-Bow, March, 1504; that he was Prebendary of Holborn in 1511; of Kensington in 1512; of Apesthorpe, or Alsthorpe, in 1514, whence he was admitted Dean of York, May 17, 1514. In 1512 he was appointed one of the Ambassadors to the Low Countries, and in 1513 [1515] we find him employed in an important commission with the Earl of Worcester respecting Tournay. His commission as Master of the Rolls bears date Jan. 22, 1507.

Of Torrigiani, his contemporary Cellini gives a striking description :—"About this time there came to Florence a sculptor named Pietro Torrigiani, who had just arrived from England, where he had resided several years; and as he was an intimate friend of my master Bertoldo, every day came to visit him. This artist, having seen my drawing and workmanship, said to me,—'I am come to Florence with the invite as many young artists as I can to England; and, having a great work in hand for the King of England, I should be glad of the assistance of my fellow-citizens of Florence.' I perceived that your manner of working and your designs are rather those of a sculptor than of a goldsmith. Now, I have considerable undertakings in bronze, so that, if you will go with me to England, I will, at once, make your fortune.' This Torrigiani was a handsome man, but of consummate assurance, having the air of a brave rather than of a sculptor; above all, his fierce gestures and his sonorous voice, with a peculiar manner of knitting his brows, were enough to frighten every one who saw him; and he was continually boasting of his valiant exploits—ove parlo sempre di quelli fatterie. His conversation happening one day to turn upon Michael Angelo Buonarroti, a drawing of mine, taken from one of the tarrocne of that divine artist, led him to say, "This Buonarroti and myself, when we were youths, to learn drawing at the Chapel of Massaccio in the Church of the Carmelites; and it was customary with Buonarroti to rally all those who were learning to draw there. One time, a scholar of his having stung me to the quick, I was provoked to an unusual degree, and, doubling my fist, I gave him so violent a blow upon the nose that I felt the bone and cartilage yield under my hand as if they had been made of paste, and the mark of that blow he will carry to his grave."

Torrigiani appears to have attained great distinction in his own country before visiting England. While here, according to Vasari, he executed a variety of works in marble, brass, and wood, but the grandest performance was the before-mentioned tomb of Henry VII., which he completed in 1519, and for which he received, it is said, £1000.† The formation of his corse was very tragical. After leaving this country he unfortunately proceeded to Spain. While there he was employed by a Spanish nobleman to carve a Madonna and Child from a model which he had already executed, and the artist was to be in proportion to the merit of the work. His employer was the Duke d'Arcos, and Torrigiani, who estimated this nobleman's generosity highly, determined to surpass his previous performance. Great part of his life had hitherto been engaged in traveling from kingdom to kingdom in search of employment, and he flattered himself that at length he had found a resting-place after all his vicissitudes. He bestowed unexampled pains upon the work, and when it was completed he presented it to the Duke: what he conceived to be a matchless specimen of his art. The nobleman surveyed the performance with delight and reverence, applauded the artist to the skies, and, inquiring the amount of his treasure, lost no time in sending for it. As a display of liberality he even loaded two servants with the money for its payment. The bulk looked promising; but when the expectant artist turned out the bags and found the contents were only heaps of maravedi, amounting in the gross to a few crowns, his disappointment at his hopes and just resentment at the cruel insult to his talents so transported him that, regardless of the merit of his work and (fatal forgetfulness!) the personal character of the statue, he snatched up his mallet and broke the figures into pieces. The Grandee, in his turn, fired with shame and revenge, and assuming to be horrified at the sacrilegious nature of the act, denounced the ill-fated artist to the Inquisition. It was in vain that the accused pleaded the right of an author over his creation. Reason was on his side, but Superstition sate in judgment. The sentence was death, by torture. The Holy Office, however, was defeated of its victim; for Torrigiani starved himself to death in prison. He died at Seville in 1022, being then fifty years of age.

LORD CLYDE'S FAREWELL TO THE INDIAN ARMY.—Lord Clyde, who was to leave Calcutta for England on the 4th inst., has issued the following farewell order to the Indian army :—"Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Adjutant-General's Office, Calcutta, May 26, 1860. The labours necessary to comprise the particulars of this order are now over. His Excellency the Viceroy has consented to permit that I may resign the command of her Majesty's forces in India, and retire to England, for a reason which must cause me long service demand. Lieut.-General Sir Hugh Rose, G.C.B., who conducted with distinguished success important part of the late campaign, will assume the command in my place on the 4th of June. On leaving the country I take with me grateful recollections of the officers and soldiers of the two services for their valour and endurance so severely tried, especially in the early part of the insurrection. History does not furnish a more remarkable exhibition of heroical resistance to very adverse circumstances than was shown by the British troops during those memorable. The memory of their constancy and daring will never die out in India, and themselves must feel that while Britain maintains such sons the rule of the Indian sovereign must be unimpaired. Soldiers! both English and native, I bid you all farewell; and I record, as my latest wish, that the bravery and endurance of which I have spoken with admiration could not alone have ensured success. That success was owing, in a great measure, to your discipline. Her Majesty's and military virtues; and I trust will never be relaxed.—CLYDE, General, Commander-in-Chief, Headquarters, Calcutta, May 30, 1860."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER.

SIR George Bowyer, sixth Baronet, of Denham Court, in the county of Bucks and second Baronet, of Radley, in the county of Berks, was the eldest son of Admiral Sir George Bowyer, a distinguished naval officer, by his second wife (the first had no issue), Henrietta, only daughter and heiress of Admiral Sir Percy Brett, Kt., M.P. He was born in 1783, and was educated at Eton, and Christchurch, Oxford, where he graduated as M.A. in 1807. He succeeded, on the death of his father, the 6th Dec., 1799, to two baronetcies—namely, the ancient baronetcy given to Ian Gwalchmai, by William Bowyer, in 1660, and the baronetcy obtained by his father's cousin, Sir George Bowyer, in 1794, in honour of his gallant conduct and his wounds in Lord Howe's victory on the First of June of that year. He was in Parliament from 1807, with a short interval, in 1818 as member for Malmesbury, and subsequently for Ampthill. He married, the 9th Oct., 1809, Anne Hammond, daughter of Captain Sir Andrew Snape Hammond, Kt., R.N. (by her who died in 1844) leaves issue three sons and two daughters. Sir George Bowyer died at Den-don the 1st inst., and is succeeded by his eldest son, now Sir George Bowyer, the seventh and third Baronet, who was born in 1811, and M.P. for Dundalk, the clever and well-known supporter of the Catholic and Ultramontane party in the House of Commons, who was born Oct. 9, 1811. The deceased Baronet's two younger sons are William, barrister-at-law; and Henry George, one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools.

GENERAL SIR H. S. ROBERTS, K.C.B.

GENERAL Sir Hopton Stratford Scott, K.C.B., a distinguished military officer who died at his residence, Woodville, Lucan, Dublin, on the 26th ult., entered the Madras (Bengal Company's) service in 1795, and in 1799 served in the Mysore campaign, and was present at the battle of Mallavelly and at the siege and capture of Seringapatam; for his conduct in the latter he received a medal from the supreme Government. In 1806 he joined the Hydrabad force, and was in the whole of the campaigns in the Deccan, against the confederated Mahrattas, up to the year 1805. He was, on the 22nd of December, 1808, in command of a detachment consisting of the 2nd Regiment of Native Cavalry and of the 2nd Battalion of the 7th Regiment of Native Infantry, and, after a march of sixty miles, attacked with the cavalry (the infantry not having come up) the Mahratta force of 3000 horse, a party of infantry, and four guns, under their chief, Seoji Vinaick, the whole of which force were killed or dispersed and their guns and baggage captured. Having attained the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, Scott joined the Hyderabad Subsidiary Force, and commanded at Hyderabad in 1812 and 1813. He joined the headquarters of the force in the field in 1814, and commanded a brigade against the Pindarees in 1815 and part of 1816; being stationed with his brigade at Nagpore and frequently employed in pursuit of the enemy. On the 17th of November, 1817, he commanded the troops at Nagpore, consisting of 1200 effective men only, and was attacked on the left of Sitabuldee by the whole of the Rajah's force, amounting to about 20,000 horse, 8000 infantry (of whom 3000 were Arabs), and 36 guns, when, after an action which lasted for eighteen hours without intermission, the enemy were repulsed with great loss, with four guns taken and others spiked. For this brilliant and decisive action he was publicly thanked by the Governor-General, and received a medal with "Sitabuldee" inscribed thereon. On the 16th of December, 1817, Lieutenant-Colonel Scott commanded the left column of attack at the battle of Maqpore, which took possession of a heavy battery and of the stores of the enemy. In the following year he headed the infantry against the Peishwah's camp in the vale of Seroy, on the 19th and 21st of April, 1818; and on the 2nd of May following he led the storming party at the assault and capture of the fortress of Chanda. In consideration of these services he was nominated in the year 1818 a Companion of the Military Order of the Bath, and was in 1831 made a Knight Commander. He became a General in 1854. Sir Hopton Scott married the youngest daughter of J. Davis Beard, Esq., of Thatcheigh, Heanton Court, and Watermouth, in the county of Devon, and has left a family, of whom three sons are at present in her Majesty's service.

THE DOWAGER LADY PERROTT.

LOUISA Augusta, Dowager Lady Perrott, whose demise took place, at her residence at Plumstead, Kent, on the 15th ult., at the advanced age of eighty-one, was the fourth daughter of the late Colonel N. Burly, M.P., formerly of the Grenadier Guards, uncle of the late Field Marshal the Marquis of Anglesey, K.G. Her Ladyship was born in 1779, and was married, on the 16th of May, 1810, to Sir R. Hawkins Perrott, Bart., who died on the 24th of March last year, leaving issue by her three sons. Lady Perrott was entitled to the privilege of the "tabouret" or seat in the Royal presence at the old Court of France, her husband's father, Sir Richard Perrott, the second Baronet, having been created a Baron of that kingdom by Louis XV., with the privilege of the "tabouret" to the wives of his R. Perrott's successors. This Sir Richard Perrott, the second Baronet, was in personal attendance upon the Duke of Cumberland, the "Butcher," and, during the Willem Hate, his house in Gloucester-view, Park-lane, dismantled and burnt by the mob. Sir Edward, his representative, was to be subject of this relique, was no less ardent in his loyalty. He was uncle of the present member for Dudley, Henry B. Sheridan, Esq., barrister-at-law, and first cousin of Sir F. Kelly, M.P., late her Majesty's Attorney General. Lady Perrott's brothers all served in the British army. The eldest, General Sir E. Burly, G.C.H., Colonel of the 8th Foot, was wounded while carrying the colours of the Coldstream Guards at Lincelles, and, having gone through the Peninsular War, was on the staff of the Duke of Wellington both in Spain and France. He subsequently commanded the Home District, and was Governor to the King, and Governor to Guernsey. Lady Perrott was also sister to Colonels Edward and Charles Burly and Major R. Burly, and sister-in-law of the late gallant General Sir J. O'Halleran, G.C.B., and of the late distinguished Admiral Nesham, who had the singular honour of being the crown in Paris for saving the life of a French citizen. Of Lady Perrott's three sons the eldest is the present Sir Edward George Lambert Perrott, Bart., K.J.J.

THE BARONESS DE RUTZEN.

THE Baroness de Rutzen died on the 16th ult., at her seat, Stebech Park, in the county of Pembroke. Her father, Nathaniel Phillips, Esq., of Stebech Park, possessed large estates in West Indies. She was his eldest daughter, by his second wife, Mary Dorothea, eldest daughter of the Rev. Edward Phillips (of the ancient house of Chilworth), Rector of Lamphey, in the county of Pembroke. Mr. Nathaniel Phillips's two only sons, Nathaniel and Edward Augustus, having died unmarried, his estates devolved on her. He had by his first marriage, with Ann, daughter of Richard Swarton, Esq., an only surviving daughter, Ann Maria, married to the late Lieut.-General Sir Thomas, K.C.B., and K.T.S. (of the Erenchi branch of the house of Lochiel), and who, with the aid and assistance of father-in-law, Mr. Phillips, raised and equipped the distinguished regiment the 79th or Cameronian Highlanders, and commanded it in the Peninsula. Mr. Nathaniel Phillips's second son exists in the descendants of the above Lady Cameron, now deceased, and her half-sister, the Baroness de Rutzen, the subject of this notice, and the Dowager Countess of Lichfield. The Baroness de Rutzen beaunified in a remarkable degree the ancient and picturesque mansion of the Stebech, a Welsh estate, Stebech Park, and that not merely in the vicinity of the Stebech Rocks, on the shore of Milford Haven, but also in Iron Ia. Having at her own expense, the church at Stebech, a superb edifice of wrought limestone. The Baroness married, secondly, the late Lieut.-General de Rutzen, K.T.S., as of October, 1822, to the Baron de Rutzen and Trunz (of the ancient house of Osnacke, in Brunswick), of the Grand Baron of the Grand Baron of Rutzen, Knight of the kingdom of Poland and the empire of Russia, and a Knight of St. John of Jerusalem.

THE REV. R. B. BOSWELL.

THE Rev. Robert Brun Boswell, Chaplain to the Hon. East India Company on the Bengal establishment, and latterly Chaplain to the East India Company at Madras, died on the 19th ult., at the age of sixty-one. His age, was (since the demise of Dr. Johnson's biographer's grandson, Sir James Boswell, of Auchinleck) the head of the family who had the honour to bear for ever connected with the fame and name of Dr. Johnson. The Rev. Mr. Bruce Boswell was the eldest son of Alexander Boswell, Esq., of Auchinleck, second great-grandson of Dr. John Boswell, brother to the Judge, Lord Auchinleck, and his unpublished son, James Boswell, the biographer, who succeeded to the property of Auchinleck in Ayrshire, but that Sir James Boswell, the last Baronet, became extinct on his death, in 1822, the Rev. Mr. Bruce Boswell graduated at Cambridge, and in 1851 went out to India as a Chaplain, and for many years was Minister of the Scotch Church, Madras. In 1856 he finally left India. He was, shortly after his return to England, appointed Chaplain to the Forces at Gibraltar, where he resided with his family until his death. Mr. Boswell married, first, Louisa, daughter of Sir Archibald Buchan Hepburn, of Smeaton Hepburn, Bart., and by her (who died in Scotland, secondly, Susan Anne, daughter of the late Major-General Carnegie, of the Royal Artillery, and by her (who survives him) has issue three sons. The eldest son, John Alexander Corrie Boswell, is in the Madras Civil Service, and is now the representative of this ancient, honourable, and Johnsonian family of Boswell.

JOHN IRVINE, ESQ.

JOHN Irvine, of Rockfield, in the county of Fermanagh, Esq., Deputy Lieutenant for that county, and its High sheriff in 1819, and a Major in the Limerick Militia, who died at his residence, Windsor-terrace, Kingstown, Royal Tyrone Militia, who died at his residence, Windsor-terrace, Kingstown, on the 8th ult., aged seventy-five years, was a direct lineal descendant of the ancient Irvines of Bonshaw, in Dumfriesshire, one of the oldest families of Scotland. He was the eldest son of Gerard Irvine, Esq., of Rockfield, by his wife, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Robert Hesnard, Esq., of Stonevile, in the county of Fermanagh. His grandfather, Mr. John Irvine, settled in the county of Fermanagh, Esq., of Stonevile, in the county of Tipperary, and his left issue five sons and two daughters. Of the former, the eldest, John, was the father of the late and two surviving sons, John Gerard Irvine, Esq., a magistrate for the counties of Fermanagh and Tyrone, and a Captain in the Fermanagh Light Infantry Militia.

* Tommaso Guidi, commonly called Masaccio, born in 1402. He studied under Donatello, Brunelleschi, Ghiberti, and Masolino da Panicale, in Florence, and then went to Pisa and Rome, where he acquired such a degree of excellence that, in the opinion of Vasari, he was the first who gave a natural expression, combined with an elevated style, to Italian painting. Annibal Caro says of him :—

L'atteggiai, l'avvivai, le diedi il moto,
E i primi effetti insegnai di Buonarroto,
A cui gli altri, da lui solo ingegni,
Quasi a lor Padre, ed a lor Duce han segno.

"THE LAST FROM THE WRECK," BY E. DUNCAN, IN THE EXHIBITION OF THE WATER-COLOUR SOCIETY.

"THE LAST FROM THE WRECK."—BY E. DUNCAN.

MR. DUNCAN'S grand picture of "The Life-boat," which will not easily be forgotten as forming one of the chief features of the Water-colour Exhibition last year, has now a fitting companion in "The Last from the Wreck," of which, as we did of its predecessor, we now give an Engraving. The incident is similar in character, but different in the composition, and is seen from a different point of view. In the former, it was all tearing-down, hurry-scurry, to the rescue of the crew of a ship on the point of foundering on a lee shore; and great and moving was the scene of excitement presented. In the present the work of rescue has been completed, with the exception of one man, "The Last from the Wreck," the captain probably, who is on the point of reaching the shore by means of rope-tackle, many a hand being held out to greet him. The small and agitated group of sailors, passengers, and others indistinctly seen behind a huge shelving rock is admirably conceived, harmonising so perfectly with the boisterous sea in front, and the fierce wind, which seems to carry all before it. The poor wreck itself, the stern only of which is seen above water, is an object which irresistibly moves our personal sympathies, as the fierce spray, lighted by a fitful sunray, dances over it. In the offing is another vessel still holding by her anchor, and hoping to weather out the storm. Too much cannot be said in praise of the whole composition and execution of this masterly work—sky, sea, and shore are all blended in one common object of terror. The light and shade are nobly balanced, and the chiaroscuro pervading the whole is admirable.

"THE OUTRAGE UPON SIR JOHN COVENTRY,"

BY T. R. MAGUIRE.

MR. T. H. MAGUIRE has a very clever picture in the Royal Academy this year upon the subject of an incident which affords a strange illustration of the state of society amongst our ancestors not quite two centuries ago, and which is further remarkable as having been the occasion of an important public enactment. Sir John Coventry, who was created K.B. at the coronation of Charles II., having indulged in a joke on the King's mistresses, the Duke of Monmouth and others had a plot to avenge the King's dignity upon him, by a most brutal outrage. The execution of the scheme was intrusted to Sir Thomas Sandys, O'Brian, and thirteen others, who, at midnight on the 21st of December, 1670, attacked Sir John in Pall-mall as he was returning home. Sir John placed his back against a wall and defended himself bravely for some time, wounding several of his assailants, but was at length orpowered and held down while they cut his nose to the bone. In consequence of this barbarity an Act was immediately passed, which received the Royal assent on the 6th of March following, to prevent malicious maiming and wounding, which is still known as Sir John Coventry's Act. Mr. Maguire has treated his subject with great ability and spirit. The composition gives an admirable idea of a street row in those lawless times, when every man was arbiter in his own quarrel, and the sword gave the law in the public streets of the metropolis. Sir John Coventry is still defending himself against his cowardly assailants, one of whom he has wounded in the arm. The arrangement of the figures is skilfully contrived. The murderous scene is dimly lighted by means of a torch held by a man who sits on a wall. The colouring of the picture is rich and full-toned, and solidly laid on. The general effect is admirable, and in every respect well adapted to the purpose.

HOWARDS' IRONWORKS.

THE Britannia Works, near Bedford, owned by Messrs. James and Frederick Howard, are a gigantic plough-manufactory, as will be conceived when it is stated that more than 200 ploughs, besides corresponding numbers of other agricultural implements, are often sent off from it in one day. The total number of implements turned out of the Britannia Works in a single year is from ten to twelve thousand. This extensive and beautifully-planned block of buildings, designed by Mr. Robert Palgrave, of Pall-mall, occupies a most convenient site. On the north the grounds run right down to the Ouse—a river navigable to the ports of Wisbeach and Lynn. On the south the chief entrance to the Works opens appropriately enough on the road to Woburn—famous for its agricultural gatherings in the time of another Duke of Bedford. But it is from their eastern aspect that the Britannia Works will be most familiar to the traveller. The line of the Midland Railway comes close under the great plough-manufactory, while the London and North-Western is almost as handy; both having branch lines into the works. The whole range of buildings occupies a space of some fifteen acres; and their erection, including the purchase of the land they stand on, has been made at an outlay of about £20,000. They are, probably, the largest works in the world devoted to the manufacture of field implements, one shop alone occupying an acre of ground. The general arrangement and construction have been pronounced to be admirable, and Mr. Palgrave has evinced a degree of taste and skill in appropriate embellishment that adds materially to the effect. It is really a handsome pile. Ornament and effect, however, are merely subsidiary points. Economy of labour, convenience of construction, and the most perfect observance of order and classification, have been the great things the architect has had to aim at. A tramway runs completely round the whole range of works, and through every shop, with a turn-table in the centre of each. The coal and fuel when landed at the wharf are thus carried up to and weighed out to every workman, by others exclusively employed for this purpose. The wrought iron is delivered from the railway by similar means, and cut off by steam-power to the several lengths required. As is the plan in a few of the large, modern cotton-mills, the raw material passes through a succession of hands to gradual completion, and at least a hundred and twenty different men have their allotted bits and parts in the make of a single plough. Wherever it is at all available the aid of machinery has been called in and devoted to an infinity of purposes, from the raising of the iron into the furnaces down even to the grinding of that standing colour the blue paint.

The workshops form a block of buildings, divided into six compartments, running parallel to each other, and, though internally divided, there is an easy communication with each—the whole forming a complete and unique structure, admirably adapted for its purpose. In their light and lofty roofs are 29,000 skylights—glazed frames in the form of tiles. The boiler-house is a lofty and well-ventilated building, having on its roof a tank containing 10,000 gallons of water. One of the most interesting departments of the works is the foundry. In its arrangement it is, perhaps, unequalled, as the beauty and clearness of its castings are unsurpassed, if not unrivalled. Here are two huge furnaces in which iron is being melted the whole day through. The hanging department comprises three immense shops thrown into one, which measures about 200 feet in length, 160 feet in width, and 40 feet in height. The roof of this spacious shop is supported wholly by iron columns, and it covers, with the foundry and engine-shop adjoining, two acres of ground. In this department all the wrought-iron work is done, and upwards of seventy forges and a furnace, employing several hundreds of hands, are in full operation.

Such are a few of the principal characteristics of this establishment, all the arrangements of which are marked by well-studied economy and the most exquisite adaptations, furnishing a striking illustration of practical science which appears to be the guiding principle of the Britannia Ironworks.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY'S MEETING AT CANTERBURY.

SINCE a hundred thousand pilgrims, with staff and sandaled shoon, wended their way to the jubilee of Becket, Canterbury has not, we never known such a congress as met within it this week to celebrate the twenty-second anniversary of the Royal Agricultural Society. It was not without a very hard struggle that the meeting was held there at all.

Sweet is the country, because full of riches, might have been a true character for Kent when Cæsar wrote his "Commentaries;" but, unfortunately, the West grew jealous of the East as soon as Hanover-street grew into negotiations with them, and it was all that the latter could do, when it had won the day, to collect £4000. The fatality of bringing cattle through the streets, and the ecclesiastic question of Canterbury, conjured up many fears that it would not be a very successful meeting. As regards receipts, very many have exceeded it, though the Yorkshire shillings will not quite make up what cost that head next year; but, in point of quality in cattle and sheep, it knows full well that the weather was as fine and the same pleasure-seeker and herdsman could desire; and in an humble way, with its arches, its flags, and its oak and laurel boughs nailed up here and there, as an expression of the loyalty of the city to all it is there to encourage in its guests. The South-Eastern politely dropped them almost at the door of the show-yard, which was scarcely a hundred feet from the station, and a three-quarters of a mile walk brought them back to the station once more. We never remember a site more exactly in keeping with the whole object of the festival. On the two years' visit to Exeter and Warwick, a grand stand has been the main feature of the background, whereas now, with the rich pasture-meadows, the old mill, and the mansion of Hales-place, and the yearling shorthorn heifers were brownocked in line almost directly under the shade of a group of elms.

When the Duke of Richmond, the president of the implement-makers, quarrelled with the society and departed, they had a notion that they had nothing to do but "march city" and leave Kent behind. They were never more mistaken. It was a positive relief to the great majority of the visitors to miss that eternal din and hissing of engines which, instead of "crushing the air to sweetness," only deafened the hearing of those who really wanted to examine the other implements; and, with the loss of the minor attractions of the show, it was fair to put forward with some reasonable chance of success. The society has made the society, and it has had, and they are now in possession of it, as there is every encouragement to take another batch of protégés by the hand, till they in turn are able to shift for themselves. Trials had been going on since the previous Wednesday, and it was not quite over on Monday morning that the implement-yard was open to visitors. The general impression seems to be that there was no extraordinary new, but the gate competition brought out upwards of two hundred candidates. Wire-tracing seemed to be much in vogue; and Culbuett's (of Bedale) self-delivering machine was among the most popular of the implements in the way. Messrs. Burgess and Key have carried off the first prize of £40 for a reaping-machine adapted for mowing corn and grass. Preston's combined mower and reaper. The final trial of the reaping-machines and mowed harvest field was on Tuesday, and occupied a very substantial hearer of £90 to those he has already achieved with his twelve-horse set of steam-cultivating apparatus. Messrs Roby and Co. took the second prize of £10 for a couple of their steam-power ploughing-tackle with a three-breasted plough by Messrs. Chandler and Oliver. Another prize of £10 was to Mr. Beard, of Bridgnorth, Shropshire, with his recent invention—a very simple contrivance by which steam-power can be applied to the ploughing of the ordinary plough. This is effected through the medium of an endless chain fixed on a framework attached to an ordinary eight-horse power engine, and the plough has the opportunity, that, whether the land be flat or hilly, of the furrows both ways.

The stalls of Messrs. Gibbs and Lawson were, as usual, perfect models—the former from its dainty arrangement of roots, and seeds in green glass covered saucers, and the latter with its miniature seed bags and long plaited tassels behind. It would be hard to say which were the new arrangement the Sunday's rest brought the judges of stock residue of the week, but the spirit of the country is more generous than it usually is, and "most grave and potent seignors" scampered off, like as many schoolboys, impatient to learn their fate. We still regret to record that, with all their fine qualities and unquestionable power, the society sinks below the level of the commonest country meeting, and, no doubt, those who have the right of entry are never allowed to see his private book, could learn whether their cattle were highly commended or commended. Some exhibitors got to know at the office of the society, but the great mass of the visitors on the Saturday day were left utterly in the dark for the lack of two or three hundred rosettes, or ribbons, and fixed numbers.

It soon transpired that the great triangular duel between Royal Butterfly, Rienzi, and Rienzi's Scottish champion Prince Alfred had been given against the county, and Colonel Townley's Remus Butterfly gone gallantly to the fore. It was no ordinary triumph, as barring four or five, a host of bulls have scarcely ever been seen together. Rienzi and Dr. M'Hale, Third Grand Duke, Royal Tyrk, and Statesman were alone conspicuous by their absence. Every one was cheerily won, and, with the exception of the traces of a blister in Mr. Stratton's breast, which is almost his only weak point, Royal Butterfly never showed to better advantage. Prince Alfred, for the three months older, hardly looked so well as when the two met at Blackheath-on-year; Archduke Wilhelm second to Royal Butterfly last year, received a high commendation. He is a very elegant bull; but we should much like to know how many months separated the two whole afternoon. It is rather remarkable that there were no less than four "first-prize" bulls in the first six; but although Prince Alfred 2nd showed a fine leg of Kentish beef, he was not quite up to the mark. Brahmin hump near the tail which played havoc with his symmetry in the fourth compartment.

The yearling bull class was nothing very remarkable, and was won by Mr. Adeane's Marksman, which was the first-rate behind the shoulders, but a good average animal, and very rich in his hide. He is only sixteen months old, and promises to make up into a very shaking carcase next year. Mr. Adeane's Fawn and Mr. Fowler's Fairfax Lyons, General Bosquet, and Bon Garçon, all did equally but successfully in the same class with his near and Mr. Overman's son of Sir Edmund and old Fairy Tale. Sir Charles Tempest took the Duke Humphrey and Knight Templar prize-quartered Prince Frederick. The Townsley Bowbent was not at all in the best of his form, and Mr. Stratton's son of Mr. Stratton cut a good figure with his Duke Humphrey and Knight of the Lagan, the latter of which he purchased after being placed third in a class of a hundred at Dublin last spring. "Hair was well served" again in the bull-calf class, which was most decidedly won by Mr. Morgan's red roan Harkaway—a thick and good son of Great Duke, but with rather plain-quartered Prince Frederick. The Townsley Bowbent was not at all in the best of his form, and

CHINA.

THE people of this country are at this moment being asked to assist in that particular mode and manner and measure which belongs to their patient function of suppliers of the public purse in another attempt to solve the slippery problem of our relations with China. With a pertinacity which seems to the Anglo-Saxon habit and temperament something ludicrous, the Celestial Empire resists our doctrine and practice of penetration and exploration into, and utilisation of, every possible and impossible region of the globe. The Chinaman in his representative character may be compared to one of those Italian toys which are called "tombolas," and which are composed of the head and shoulders caricaturally based, if they can be said to be based, on a rounded bottom, so that the figure is always tottering and nodding, is very easily knocked over, but instantly recovers its shaky equilibrium, and at each recovery presents the same fixed leer on its impassible countenance. The experiment of what we may be excused for calling pitching into such a specimen of ungainly agility, and such a remarkable illustration of the doctrine of forces, may be repeated any given number of times, and always with the same effect. We are about once more to see whether we cannot only knock over the Chinese "tombola" with the usual facility, but whether we cannot keep him down in a fixed position until such time as we are enabled to persuade him that we are earnestly and anxiously desirous of breathing intelligence into his rigid eye and his stolid countenance, and to substitute for his tottering and treacherous base a pair of active and springy legs with which he will be able to walk erect and stately, instead of continuing to roll about in his present uneasy, unsatisfactory, and absurd fashion. The only question is, whether we are setting about in the most approved manner to deal with the peculiarities of the moral "tombola", which we have taken under our patronage, and which we are determined to reconstruct, of course for his own good, and without the slightest foregone conclusion or the least selfish idea intruding itself into our minds and intentions.

In considering the Chinese question in this point of view it does not seem necessary to enter on a retrospective review even of the more recent circumstances which led eventually to the Treaty of Tien-Tsin. At the same time it is not possible to avoid a consideration of the policy as a whole—and it has been somewhat uniform—which this country has adopted in its long struggle to obtain a footing in the Celestial Empire. It would seem that the error which has lain at the root of all our proceedings has been the confounding of the Chinese character with that of the Asiatics with whom we have had previously to deal. Starting with that notion, we have proceeded as if the policy which, backed by European force, physical and moral—would act with equal facility on the Chinese, as a nation, as we have proved that it has acted on the inhabitants of Hindostan. Although, until lately, any hostile encounter between the troops of Great Britain and any martial array which the Chinese Government could bring against us ended but in one way, it has from time to time appeared that the ultimate effect has been pretty much that which follows the firing of musketry into bags of cotton. Victory has always been followed by submission, no doubt, but hollow in its nature and temporary only in its duration. It has never been possible to reckon with certainty when, or where or how not to have a Chinese war on our hands. The very eagerness to make a material impression on the rigid polity of exclusion of outside barbarians which we have shown, has, as it seems to us, always brought out in its strongest development that deplorable obstinacy which is the Chinese character, as exhibited in their institutions, customs, and habits. In our hurry to beat them into friendship and intercourse we have overlooked the effect upon their feelings which such a course would engender, and have been mistaken in any supposition that they would crouch and yield to coercion, after the manner of the more supple inhabitants of India, to whom absolute resignation to authority, even when it takes the shape of tyranny, is a second nature. Our somewhat sanguine and ungainly attempts at a policy of negotiation and diplomacy have always been accompanied or preceded by an exhibition of physical force, and our messengers of peace and goodwill, who professed to be teachers to the Chinese of what was good for them, have usually been surrounded with that sort of adjunct which Mr. Gladstone has lately described as a peaceful demonstration of 10,000 soldiers. The result has been to excite the generation of sentiments of dislike and distrust, the more deeply-rooted because the exponents of Christianity and the missionaries of commercial and trading fraternisation have generally, if not always, appeared in the guise of armed hands, and the alleged introduction of the arts and amenities of peace and western civilisation have taken the shape of a baptism of blood.

It thus came to pass that when our diplomacy, in the case of the mission of Lord Elgin, became a reality its difficulties were doubled and its results doubtful and fleeting. It is for us to be questioned that our Plenipotentiary evinced great skill and resolution; and, although there was an undercurrent of mistake arising out of haste and heedlessness, and which was corrected by the caution and firmness of the commander of our naval forces in the Chinese waters, there is little doubt that the obtaining of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin was a great advance on our previous diplomacy, and it bid fair to ensure some of that permanence of our relations with China which hitherto we can hardly be said to have attained. The blunder was the return of Lord Elgin to England before he had in person obtained the ratification of the treaty. The transference of the chief authority in this matter to another hand seems to us to have been exactly the circumstance most likely to have suggested to the wily and faithless minds of the Chinese authorities the opportunity of slipping out of their engagements. With a greater knowledge of our half-headed way of rushing at conclusions with them than we give them credit for, it is probable that the stipulation that the Embassy should proceed by another route to Pekin than that of the Peiho was a trap laid for our administrators. It was doubtless calculated that the English would surrender their dignity slighted by a condition of that kind, and that a course which the Ministers of Russia and of the United States, whose management of Chinese peculiarities we should do well to imitate, at least in some degree, would be haughtily rejected by the British authorities. The instructions given that Mr. Bruce should be accompanied by an armed escort were founded on a not unnatural mistrust; but, not too speak too lightly of such a thing, it seems to us that we might have perilled the loss of a few diplomatists in an attempt at carrying out our objects by moral influence; and although, looking to our antecedent relations with the Chinese, it is possible that our mission might not have travelled towards the capital of the Emperor with so full a sense of safe-conduct as the Minister of the United States could and did, still the attempt might and ought to have been made. It is possible, and, indeed, probable, that our mission would have reached Pekin in safety, and that check, indeed that defeat, which has caused an enforced interruption of our proceedings in China for more than a year, and which has thrown our "prestige" back fifty years, would not, and, in fact, could not, have occurred. As it is, everything has to be begun over again, and with the additional difficulty which has naturally resulted from the first real triumph of the Chinese arms over the forces of this country.

There can, however, be but few who will conscientiously object that anything is left to us but the vigorous reassertion of our power. In spite of all the obstacles opposed to us, English interests in China have attained such an importance; so many British subjects are actively ingrafted on that empire; so much capital has been invested in the trade with that country; so many of its commodities have been adapted to our habits of life; and, in short, China is so decidedly one of our markets that our rulers are bound to preserve for us, at least, that position which we have obtained in its soil, and even that would be perilled unless a vigorous and a determined course were to be pursued. Unless, then, the second mission of Lord Elgin should be successful in obtaining a peaceful solution of the case as it stands, we have only the melancholy alternative of a recourse to arms, and that with a decision and a steady continuity which must put an end to all doubt or mistake about the ultimate result. Nevertheless, we are not without hope that the experience and the matured judgment of the Plenipotentiaries who have been once more intrusted with a diplomatic commission may lead to a happier end than could at any rate be doubted by the world. It is to be hoped that the arrangements for system of pure conciliation, and to beget a real confidence in the exact nature of our objects, among the Chinese; but it is still a possibility, and such a course as will prevent bloodshed ought to be tried by all means and with all patience and tact. It will be obvious that the whole of the operations will have to be conducted on a very different scale to any that we have yet carried on in China. It will no longer be a hurling of a few battalions against an outlying province of China, but it will be a contest between the two empires of which it is not easy to foresee the termination or to predicate the result.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS

FRANCE

The Emperor and Court are at St. Cloud; later they are expected at Biarritz. The Empress is in the Empress's tent at the Camp de Châlons. Here, probably, some 60,000 men will be found in the highest state of military perfection. Some experiments are to be made this year in the formation of the Prussian system, in which infantry, cavalry, and artillery will be engaged. The camp of Châlons will present many novel features, highly interesting to military men. The Emperor has been receiving at St. Cloud a series of deputations from various branches of the manufacturing and agricultural interests, and listens, it is said, with patient attention to all complaints proffered against his administration, his Ministers, and his prefects.

The Paris Journal says the Emperor has taken the initiative of recommending the different Cabinets to recognise Spain as one of the "great Powers of Europe, which, supposing the claim to be established, will henceforth be the equal of France, and that the proposal although not yet finally accepted, is favourably received in principle.

The Moniteur of Wednesday publishes the decree frigate having left for Newfoundland, with Commandant de Montagnac de Chauvance on board. The object of the mission is, it is said, to study the question of the limits of the French and English fisheries on the great bank—a matter which has occupied diplomacy for the last half century.

The Moniteur announces the release from the fort of Ham of citizen M. Grandguillot, against the false rumours which are current concerning the state of his health, and of 11,000f. as compensation for 1851.

The Presse states that orders have been received to hasten the fitting out of the plated man-frigate La Gloire. It is supposed that she is intended to convey the Emperor on his voyage to Genoa and Algeria.

The Paris correspondent of the Times writes:—"I hear that the Emperor, on his return, has adopted the formation of a Franco-Irish Association (sic national) like that in England. The person under whose discovery it will be placed is Mr. Bernard, the famous bankrupt solicitor. It is expected that the National Guard, and such of the public as join the Association, will soon become, under this training, expert marksmen."

The annual fête of the children of Mr. Gurney's Sunday-school at Paris came off on Saturday last, and, as usual, was a most delightful one in the part of the youthful parishioners which must have rejoiced the heart of their kind pastor. The following particulars of the excursion are from the Paris correspondent of the Morning Advertiser:—"Upwards of one hundred young people of all ages between infancy and youth assembled at eleven in the morning, together with their parents, friends, and well-wishers, in the little church of the Madeleine, which was gaily decorated with flowers for the occasion. Morning service was performed thereby, and a most impressive sermon was delivered by Mr. Gurney, after which, by the special leave of the police authorities, the whole party came out in order of procession, headed by a banner gaily in their head, and a grand standard inscribed with the words 'Love and Reward' hanging on the rear, to the Place de la Concorde, where omnibuses were waiting to transport the party to the park of St. Cloud. Such doings by 'les Anglais' were never before heard of in Paris, and many were the inquiries of the curious as to the meaning of the youthful company passed along with their worthy pastor in front and two other gentlemen driving. Arrived at the park, a table set out with cakes and sweet boys and girls, out for a holiday, amused themselves and compelled their elders to be amused also, amongst the green woods and breezy heights of St. Cloud on a delightful summer afternoon. If one may judge of the extent of the exercise taken, the good spirits imparted, and the fresh air inhaled by the terrible onslaught which the refreshments committed on the 'tea and plum-cakes' laid out on the green sward, there could have been no insufficiency in the former source of enjoyment, any more than in the latter. Long before the benefit of all parties concerned, that on this occasion 'good digestion waited on appetite,' had been fully exhausted, consequences which probably have been the result. It was past ten ere the party, with heads somewhat less erect than at the first meeting, assembled in the omnibuses for the long and revelry-hymn and receive a parting benediction before saying 'Good night.'

NAPLES

Serious disturbances have occurred at Naples in consequence of a manifestation made by the population at the landing of the Neapolitan refugees who have taken shelter in Sardinia. The people remained to return to their country. The troops fired upon the people, several of whom were killed. Patrols are constantly traversing the streets. The moderate party is full of apprehensions concerning the future course of events. An inspector of the former police was stabbed in the Strada di Toledo. Proclamations of Garibaldi and Settembrini against the Bourbon dynasty have been distributed.

A new Ministry has been, or is about to be, formed; but Commander Martino will, it is announced, hold office in the new Administration.

AUSTRIA

The Vienna Chamber of Commerce, letters state, has resolved to address a petition to the Emperor, praying his Majesty to re-establish the Ministry of Commerce, seeing that it is of the utmost interest for the empire that all the economical interests (trade, manufactures, mines, agriculture, and roads) should be under the management of one central administration.

The Vienna journals announce that Prince de Metternich, Austrian Minister at Paris, has obtained leave of absence, and intends to pass it on his estates in Bohemia.

Advices from Vienna announce the provisional departure of the Emperor of Austria for Toeplitz, where he is to meet the Prince Regent of Prussia.

GERMANY AND DENMARK

The affair of the Danish Duchies seems to become more and more threatening. Germany will not yield, and Denmark does not seem inclined to make an inch. It is reported that Prussia is about to call upon the Diet to enforce the Federal decision, that as to say armed intervention, in favour of the Duchies forming part of the Germanic Confederation. The Prussian Minister, Count Bernstorff, and the Democratic Cabinet, representing Scandinavian ideas, letters state, appears likely soon to take the direction of affairs, and the probability of a similar change at Stockholm is announced.

GREECE

There has been a change in the Greek Ministry. M. Commoundouros, the Minister of Finance, having retired, the Ministry has been reformed as follows:—Kanoulis, Marine, President of the Council; Botzaris, War; Condouriotis, Foreign Affairs; Rhallis, Public Worship; Lycurgus Crestenites, Interior; Rostakis Simos, Finances. The Prince Alexis Orloff, Comte de Paris, and Duc de Chartres, arrived at Athens on the 1st of July; they were received by the King and Queen. The King paid them a visit next day. They paid a rapid visit to the antiquities, and left on the 3rd for Corfu.

UNITED STATES

The eighty-fourth anniversary of the independence of the United States has been celebrated with great enthusiasm throughout the States.

A large meeting of the Democratic party was held in Tammany Hall, New York, on the 2nd inst., to ratify the nomination of Douglas for the Presidency, and Mr. Johnson for the Vice-Presidency. The administration and Lecompton were severely and strongly denounced.

A meeting of the Breckenridge-Lane Committee had been held at Syracuse, in which it was resolved to make preparations for running the electoral ticket.

The New York Democratic State Convention had nominated thirty-five candidates as nominations of Breckenridge and Joseph Lane.

The case of the capture of Miramon's two steamers, Marquez and Habana, which were recently tried at New Orleans, had been decided, the Judge having declared their steamers not to be lawful prizes, and ordered their restitution. The claim for indemnity was withdrawn.

THE MASSACRES IN SYRIA

The worst feats respecting the massacres of Christians at Damascus have been realised. A telegram received by the Vienna Government states:—"A fearful massacre has taken place at Damascus. Five hundred Christians, among whom are the Consuls, and the Dutch Consul, the American Consul is wounded. Details are wanting." This is confirmed by the following despatch from the British naval commander in the Levant:—"Beyrout, July 11.—The attack of the Druses on the Christians at Damascus commenced on the evening of the 9th inst., and lasted all night and continued the greater part of the next day. It is said that the consulates were burnt down, with the exception of the English and Russian. The French, Russian, and Greek Consuls took refuge in the house of Abd-el-Kader. The attitude of the Turkish authorities was indecisive, and was rather injurious than useful to the Christians. The regular Turkish troops arrived to-day. The fears of the Christians are redoubted, and the Commissioners Vely and Derwish are expected to-morrow."

The previous news was from Beyrout to the 23rd of June, when it was reported that the panic among the Christian population had become general. The Moslem fanatics of Hasbeiya had risen, and as many of the Christians as could, had taken refuge on board the steamer Leopard, which was expected to arrive at Beyrout. The steamer Kennet had embarked the cash, books, and personnel of the Ottoman Bank, and a corps of the English regiment was ready. In addition to this, parties of marines from the British, French, and Russian ships had landed to assist in maintaining order in the town.

It was reported on the 25th of June that Soutzo Constantine Effendi Pacha had left for Syria with full powers. He will have under his orders 6,000 men, 2,000 of whom is Hafiz Pacha will bring. The Turkish Government was shipping corn to Beyrout. A French vessel had been sent to Latakia, and was obliged to take up a position within gunshot of the town, in order to protect the consul and a number of the inhabitants. The naval authorities were taking measures in order to be in readiness to land troops should the necessity arise.

The Daily News' correspondence from Beyrout comes down to the 1st inst., and is full of horrible details as to the previous massacres. The writer says:—"Up to the 30th June, insisting on the assurance of the Government in the dreadful atrocities. A nominal list has been taken of them, and up to the present night, according to which the Druses had burnt and pillaged no less than one hundred and fifty-one Christian villages since the 27th of May last, while no less than seventy-five to eighty thousand Christian inhabitants of Lebanon many of whom were a month ago wealthy men, others in quite easy circumstances, are now reduced to beggary, many of them to utter homeless beggary, depending on actual charity for their daily bread.

"Over and above the 151 villages that are now in ashes, a hundred and eighty thousand persons shot in cold blood by the Druses and hunted and pillaged no less than one hundred and fifty-one Christian villages since the 27th of May last, while no less than seventy-five to eighty thousand Christian inhabitants of Lebanon many of whom were a month ago wealthy men, others in quite easy circumstances, are now reduced to beggary, many of them to utter homeless beggary, depending on actual charity for their daily bread.

"Over and above the 151 villages that are now in ashes, a hour after bringing my own four years' experience in Syria to bear upon the subject, I am bound to say that I have considerably understated the case. Moreover, I believe sterling would not pay for the towns, villages, hamlets, and silk factories destroyed throughout the mountains—all the property, in fact, belonging to Christians, that a tolerably long list of convents, churches, and nunneries, belonging to the same people. All of which, I repeat, have been destroyed, and then destroyed by Druses. In short, what commenced as a civil war between the two sects can no longer be called by that name. For the last twenty days it has been nothing less than a general massacre of Christians by Druses, and a wanton destruction of all property belonging to the former by the latter."

The Austrian frigate Radetski has been ordered to proceed to Syria to co-operate with the vessels of the other Powers for the protection of the Christians.

The Constitutionnel of Wednesday publishes an article, signed by M. Granguillot, in which the latter gentleman says:—"I have just come to Syria. M. Grandguillot says:—"Turkey is either powerless or has no foresight. The evil which has been committed is great. To Europe, having taken up with energy the question, the continuation not its renewal, and will remember her duties towards populations who have been the victims of fanaticism, and for those centuries have endured servitude to Turkey."

The Moniteur of Thursday says:—

"The Sultan has addressed the following letter to the Emperor, under date July 16—'I have at heart that your Majesty should know with what grief I have learnt of the events in Syria. Let your Majesty be convinced that I shall employ all my powers for establishing security and order in Syria, and that I shall severely punish the guilty parties, whoever they may be, and render justice to all. In order to leave no doubt whatever of the intentions of my Government, I have intrusted that important mission to my Minister for Foreign Affairs, with whose principles your Majesty is acquainted.'"

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegram was received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) morning:—

AUSTRIA.—Vienna, Thursday.—In to-day's extraordinary sitting of the enlarged Reichsrath an autograph letter of the Emperor, addressed to the President, and dated the 17th inst., was read as an Imperial message. In this letter his Majesty notified his resolution that the establishment of new imposts or the increase of those already existing, the determining upon the assessment of direct taxation, the imposition of excise duties, and the alteration of customs duties on legal transactions, and, finally, the concluding of new loans, shall in future only be effected with the consent of the Austrian Council of the Empire.

INDIA AND CHINA MAILS.—Southampton, Thursday.—The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Rigen, Captain Christian, with the heavy portion of the India and China mails, has arrived. The Rigen brings 120 passengers, £1161 in specie, and a general cargo, including 143 bales of silk. On the 16th she exchanged passengers with the steam-ship Africon, the ship Severn, and the steamer Sultan.

THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

Garibaldi has been obliged once more to change his Ministry. Count Cavour had my envoy La Farini, to accept the annexation of Sicily. The General demurred to this interference, and sent the Minister back again. His Government resigned, and a new one replaced by others. Signor Interdonato, Amari, the historian, and Signor Errante, are among the members. Subsequently was stated Signor La Loggia, Saperta, and Orrini remained. The official journal publishes the following note in relation to this event:—"On Saturday Signor La Farini, Grandi, and Botti were removed from Palermo by order of the Dictator. Griselli and Totti are Corsicans affiliated to the police of the Continent. The three were expelled for having conspired against order. The Government, which watches over public tranquillity, could not tolerate the presence of such individuals." Another note says:—"The National Society, whose objects have been reduced since Garibaldi declined the presidency, has been rather a hindrance than an assistance to the Sicilian cause."

The causes which led to La Farini's expulsion from Palermo by Garibaldi have been explained by La Farini in a statement published by him in a Piedmontese journal. La Farini denied that Sicily should immediately be annexed to the Sardinian kingdom, while Garibaldi wished annexation to be postponed until the whole of Italy, including Venetia and Rome, should have been liberated. Moreover, La Farini disapproved the ministerial appointments made by Garibaldi, complaining that among the new Ministers were men who had been Bourbonists or Mazzinians, and that special and undue encouragement was given to Mazzinians, notwithstanding their unpopularity, and so Garibaldi stopped his complaints—and probably his intrigues also—by summarily sending him under a guard on board a Sardinian ship.

The Neapolitan steam-corvette Veloce, six guns, and two other Neapolitan vessels, merchantmen, have passed over to Garibaldi.

The Opinione Nationale has received by telegraph the following important news from Messina, under date of July 13:—"On the 14th Garibaldi, at the head of 3000 men, effected a junction with Medici. On the next day, the 15th, General Bosco, with 4000 men and three guns, sallied forth from Messina, marching in the direction of Barcelona. A battle and an attack on Messina seem, therefore, imminent. The French Consulate at Messina is crowded with people, who ask to take refuge on the steam-frigate Desaix." The Consul has protested against any bombardment of the town until sufficient time has elapsed for foreigners to leave it."

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The foundation-stone of a new church, dedicated to St. Mary, was laid at Selly Oak, Birmingham, on Thursday week, by Dr. Lebeau.

On Thursday week the church of St. Thomas, Henningford-road, Islington, was consecrated by the Bishop of London.

Messrs. Cubitt and Bell are erecting a window in Gloucester Cathedral to the memory of the late Sir B. W. Guise, Bart.

The foundation-stone of Christ Church, Perconville (on the site of the church now in Seven-street), originally projected by the incumbent, the Rev. A. L. Courtenay, D.D., was laid by the Right Hon. Lord Alwyn yesterday.

A second free and open church is to be built in Liverpool, in St. Augustine's district, where, from about 4000, the population within the last few years has risen to 17,000 souls, the increase being almost entirely of the working classes.

The Bishop of Exeter has lately arrived at the College, Durham, from his seat near Torquay, for the purpose of keeping up his term of residence. His Lordship is in the enjoyment of his usual health, and attends service daily at the Cathedral.

The venerable and kind Dean of Bangor, who is now on a visit at Aberdare, South Wales, is actively engaged in preaching, examining schools, &c., and has taken a class at the Sunday-school during his stay at that place.

The Archbishop of York preached his farewell sermon to his neighbours at Bishop Auckland, in St. Mary's Chapel, last night, after a ministry of enthroning the new Archbishop will take place in York Minster on Friday.

Considerable improvements and additions are being made in St. Matthew's Church, Holbeck; and one of the congregation (Mr. W. Naylor) is building the spire at his own cost, as sentinel that a chapel be erected towards which Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Murch have contributed as one window of stained glass.

TESTIMONIALS.—The parishoners of St. Paul's, Holm Cultram, Cumberland, have agreed to the Rev. Richard Parkin, Vicar of the parish, a testimonial, consisting of a handsome silver tea-service, and a purse containing twenty-three sovereigns.——Rev. C. Packer has received from the parishioners of Longwood, near Huddersfield, a purse, containing 40l. 6s., on his leaving that parish after a residence of twelve months, in consequence of ill-health.

CHURCHES REOPENED.—The parish church of Silmouth was reopened on Thursday with much rejoicing, after having undergone an entire rebuilding, with the exception of the arcading and tower.——On Thursday the 30th inst. the parish church of Milton Abbott, near Tavistock, after having undergone a complete restoration and great improvement.——On the 4th inst., the church of St. David, Llanllwyne, near Fishguard, Pembrokeshire, after having been closed for repairs, on Sunday last the service was read by Chitton, Berks, after restoration. After the evening service three hundred poor persons sat down to tea in the factory and, we were told, on by the aid of other visitors.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—Rectories: Rev. F. T. Hill to Terling, Essex; Rev. C. B. A. G. Hutton to Emberton, Bucks. Vicarages: Rev. H. Burton, Clapham to the Bishop of Exeter, to St. Mary's Church, Devon: Rev. J. Harris to Dalston, Cumberland; Rev. E. Malleson to Weald Newton, Sussex.——Perpetual Curacies: Rev. C. W. Lancaster to Norwood, to the Lambeth House of Industry, Norwood.——Perpetual Curacies: Rev. A. Lyttelton, Hagley, Worcestershire, to Christ Church, Christ Church, Rettinge-hill; Rev. S. S. Wainwright to Holy Trinity, Micklegate, York. Cheswick to Upminster, Essex; Rev. J. Townson to Askham, Westmoreland.—Guardian.

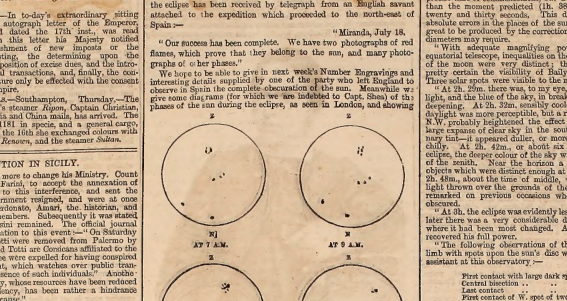
DEATH OF LORD ELPHINSTONE.—We regret to announce the death of Lord Elphinstone, the late Governor of Bombay, who had recently returned from India. The melancholy event took place on Thursday morning last.

THE SMITHFIELD CLUB.—At an adjourned general meeting of the members of the Club, held at the Agricultural Hall, on Monday, a resolution was carried by a large majority for leasing the Cattle Show for a period of twenty years to the Agricultural Hall Company upon the terms agreed upon. There is consequently now no further impediment to the carrying out of the arrangements for the erection of the proposed hall for the new building. The specifications for the intended hall of exhibition are already in hand. The annual Cattle Show at the Agricultural Hall Smithfield Club will be removed from Baker-street to Islington, upon a plot of ground known as Dizon's Lake.

WORCESTER EXCAVATIONS.—The uncovering of the room containing the forge, &c., has been continued, and several new features have been brought to light. The remains of another furnace have been found, and from some fragments of material which have been picked up it now appears probable that it was the workshop of no enamellers. Among the objects found within the last few days is a well-preserved stirrup. The men are now largely employed in preparing the ruins for the reception of the public generally. Arrangements are in progress, which will begin on Monday, the 27th of August, and will be open for the days of the meeting, for the locked city of Worcester, and is conducted over the excavations by Mr. Wright in person.



THE ECLIPSE OF THE SUN.

THE following brief statement of an important discovery made during the eclipse has been received by telegraph from an English savant attached to the expedition which proceeded to the north-east of Spain:—

"Miranda, July 18.

"Our success has been complete. We have two photographs of red flames, which prove that they belong to the sun, and many photographs of other phases."

We hope to be able to give in next week's Number Engravings and interesting details supplied by one of the party who left England to observe the Sun's the complete obscuration of the sun. Meanwhile we give some diagrams (for which we are indebted to Capt. Shea) of the phases of the sun during the eclipse, as seen in London, and pursued also the spots on the sun's disc before, during, and after the eclipse. Deeper line of darkness on the eclipsed part of the sun—nothing on the body of the moon—was observed by Captain Shea at three p.m., immediately after the greatest observation: this is shown in our Engraving.

In the metropolis the sky was somewhat unpropitious for viewing the phenomenon. A slight mist prevailed on Wednesday afternoon a slight flattening of the sun was visible low down on the right hand side. The clouds had given way just then, and allowed the beginning of the phenomenon to be fairly well seen. Then the sun was again obscured again, however; but towards the middle and most important period, at about a quarter to three, they opened again, and gave an admirable view of the strange sight. The sun was a thin crescent, with the horns pointing downwards, and the light was greatly subdued. The sky was far too cloudy for purposes of satisfactory observation; the moon's progress across the face of the sun was, however, traceable at intervals to the termination of the eclipse.

The following particulars were communicated to the Times by Mr. Hind, writing from Mr. Bishop's Observatory, Regent's Park:—

"The sky was too much obscured in the direction of the sun to enable us to ascertain satisfactorily the times of beginning and ending of the eclipse; indeed, at the ending the sun was invisible. At 1h. 58m. 24s., or ten seconds before the calculated time of commencement at the observatory, the eclipse had certainly not begun. On the next view of the sun, at 3h. 33m. 11s., the indentation of the moon upon his disc was very perceptible. I cannot undertake to say to the precise time of commencement, but I imagine it must have been later than the moment predicted (1h. 59m. 34s.), probably by between twenty and thirty seconds. This difference can hardly arise from absolute errors in the places of the sun and moon, though it is not too much to be accounted by the correction which the assumed ratio of the diameters may require.

"With somewhat magnifying power on Mr. Bishop's ten-feet equatorial telescope, inequalities on the preceding and following limbs of the lunar disc were very distinct: they were great enough to render pretty certain the visibility of Bally's beads in the last of totality. Three solar spots were visible to the naked eye.

"At 3h. 33m. there was, to the eye, a perceptible diminution of sunlight, and the line of the sky, in breaks towards the N.E. was certainly deepening. At 3h. 39m. sensibly darker. At 3h. 43m. the decrease in daylight was more perceptible, but a rather heavy nimbus cloud in the N.W. probably heightened the effect of the eclipse. At 3h. 57m. a large expanse of clear sky in the direction of the sun's disc was not of the ordinary tint—it appeared duller, or more of an indigo-blue; the air very chilly. At 4h. 42m. or about six minutes previous to greatest eclipse, the deeper colour of the sky was very marked, in a break N.W. of the zenith. Near the horizon a mistiness had arisen, obscuring objects which were distinct enough at the beginning of the eclipse. At 5h. 48m., about the time of middle, with the sun shining clearly, the light thrown over the grounds of Mr. Park was yellow, as frequently remarked on previous occasions when the sun has been equally obscured.

"At 5h. the eclipse was evidently lessening its effects, and six minutes later there was a very considerable difference in the blue of the sky, where it had been remarkably changed. At 6h. the sun had almost recovered his full power.

"The following observations of the times of contact of the moon's limb with spots upon the sun's disc were taken by Mr. C. G. Talmage, assistant at this observatory:—

	h.	m.	s.
First contact with large dark spot ..	1	54	51
Central bisection	2	01	22
Last contact	2	08	14
First contact of W. spot of two ..	2	44	39
Last contact	2	44	59
First contact of E. spot	2	47	03
Last contact	2	47	19
A dark spot wholly emerged ..	3	26	19
Another spot clear of the moon ..	3	26	29

"At 2h. 30m. Mr. Talmage considered the sky much darker than five minutes previously, and the appearance of a November sky just before a snowstorm. At 2h. 37m. the light of the sky was similar to that of a summer's evening about half an hour before sunrise. At 2h. 42m. (the time of the great eclipse), Highgate Church, visible at the commencement, could not be discerned; it was seen again at 3h. 10m. At 3h. 15m. the thermometer stood at 70·3 deg., at 2h. 30 m. the reading was 69·3 deg., and at 3h. 0·8 deg. This, towards the time of greatest phase the temperature fell 1 deg. in fifty minutes, but only 0·5 deg. in the next hour and a half."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

RIFLE VOLUNTEER CORPS.

REVIEW BY THE QUEEN AT EDINBURGH.—We have authority to state that her Majesty has been pleased to intimate her intention to hold a review of volunteer corps at Edinburgh on the 7th of August. The commanding officers of corps desiring to attend must intimate their wish to the Secretary of State for war, through the Lord-Lieutenant of their respective counties, on or before 1st of August, and they will then be admitted, as far as space and numbers will permit. Immediately on receiving this application each corps will be informed whether it will be possible to accept the offer.

THE LANCASHIRE VOLUNTEERS.—The review of the Liverpool volunteers on Aintree racecourse last Saturday was a very brilliant affair. About 4000 infantry and artillery were assembled, and the attendance of spectators was immense. Colonel M'Murdo, the inspecting officer, paid a very high compliment to the volunteers, and the general result was, of course, most satisfactory, the only drawback of the military efficiency attained by the patriotic men of Liverpool.

INSPECTION OF VOLUNTEERS BY THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—On Monday there was a general inspection in the Home Park, Windsor, by his Grace the Duke of Wellington, of the Victoria Rifle Corps, under the command of Major Whitbread, and the Monmouthshire Artillery Corps, under the command of Colonel Lord Colville, with a six-pounder, commanded by Captain Jay. Altogether there were between seven and eight hundred men present. The Duke arrived on the ground at four o'clock, attended by Colonel Scobell Percival, who acted as aide-de-camp, and Captain Garnett, and was received with the usual salute. Afterwards the volunteers marched past in quick time, and performed a variety of evolutions in the presence of the Iron Duke, and the marked approval of a large concourse of spectators who surrounded the park.

VOLUNTEER FETE AT MENTROSE.—The programme of a gathering of the different volunteer companies of Forfarshire and Kincardineshire, to take place in the Lecks of Montrose on Tuesday and Wednesday, August 25 and 26, has just been published. At this gathering, which is to be held partly for the sake of rifle-shooting, a cup of the value of 50 guineas, open to all Scotland, will be shot for, any number of rifles to be represented in the eight-hundred yards. The ranges will be—five shots at 700 yards, five at 800, and five at 900, the entrance 10s., and competitors for this prize, which is a gold cup, and the best rifle-men in Scotland, are required to give in their names to the general secretary, Mr. Hood, 20, Forfarshire Rifles, Montrose, before the evening of the 12th of August. Mr. Horatio Ross, of Netherby (father of the champion shot of England), and Colonel Kinloch, of Kinloch, have accepted seats on the LAND FOR RIFLE-PRACTICE.—The following is the chief clause of the new Act for facilitating the acquisition by rifle volunteer corps of grounds for rifle-practice:—"Any rifle volunteer corps may receive or acquire by such grants as are hereinafter mentioned any land for rifle-practice, and for the erection of butts and other accommodation for the use of the corps when practising with rifles, subject to the following restrictions:—That the assent of her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for War previously to the time being, hereinafter called the said Principal Secretary, shall be obtained to the purchase by any corps of any land exceeding in value the sum of 50*l.*, and to land by any person or body of persons, in pursuance of the powers hereinafter given; and, in addition to such assent, no section of Parliament shall be obtained in manner hereinafter mentioned, before it shall be lawful for any volunteer corps to put in force such provisions of the Acts hereinafter incorporated as relate to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement."

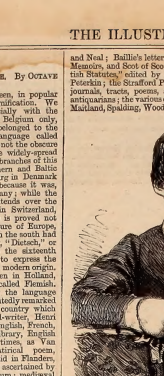
MILITARY LESSONS.—The Gillingham Volunteer Artillery and the Rochester and Chatham Royal Engineer Volunteers, in charge of the siege train, were engaged on Wednesday in siege operations against Chatham. A number of manœuvres were carried with great spirit, the attack and defence being conducted in a manner that reflected much credit on the several corps who took part in them. The siege operations were under the general direction of General H. Eyre. The whole occupied nearly three hours, and gave a lively idea of what a real siege would be.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR INDIA.—Early on Tuesday morning the reinforcements for India, which left Portsmouth on board the Crocker, 1320 tons, Captain R. Dean, for Calcutta, left Chatham garrison and proceeded to Gravesend, embarking on board the Crocker. The reinforcements consisted of detachments of the Royal Artillery—nine men of the 1st battalion 20th Regiment; thirty-nine men of the 2nd Dragoons; forty-two men of the 1st battalion 24th Regiment; one hundred and nine men of the 57th Regiment; and one hundred and twenty-six men of the 98th Light Infantry, under the command of Lieutenant Bushman, 2nd Dragoon Guards; Lieut. J. R. Wilmer, Royal Artillery; Lieut. H. Archdale, Lieut. W. T. Bagnall, Ensign T. A. Bowden, 20th Regiment; Ensign T. Macauley, 20th Regiment; Ensign R. S. Riddell, and Ensign J. R. Collins, 24th Regiment; Lieut. G. S. Browne, 42nd Regiment; Lieut. A. Ryrie, 98th Regiment; and Staff Assis.-Surg. Illingworth. Lieut.-Col. Gordon, Brigade-Major, Chatham, was present to see the reinforcements off on board.——The following officers and troops are ordered to embark at Gravesend on board the Crocker, for Calcutta:—Lieut.-Col. Gordon, Brigade-Major; Lieut. A. W. Adams, and sixty-three men of the 23rd Royal Welsh Fusiliers; Major B. Walker, Lieut. H. Hamilton, and one hundred and seven men of the 57th Regiment; Lieut. J. W. Mitchell, Ensign A. F. Kidston, and one hundred men of the 42nd Royal Highlanders; Lieut. H. Hamilton, Ensign J. Bushman, and one hundred and eighty-eight men of the 56th Regiment; Lieut. F. P. Daniel, Ensign J. S. Buckle, and one hundred and twenty-six men of the 98th Regiment; and Staff-Assis.-Surg. J. S. Joynt.

The Committee on Military Organisation, of which Sir James Graham is president, has presented a report to the War Department recommending important alterations with respect to the existing regulations for the government of the several departments of Woolwich Arsenal. At present each department is presided over by a separate head, which has resulted in much complication and inconvenience, and it is now recommended that the whole establishment shall be under the government of a director-general to be appointed by her Majesty, and to whom the superintendents of the manufacturing departments shall be responsible. The Committee also recommend the office of Director-General of Artillery, last filled by General Cator, and abolished about four years ago, shall be re-established.

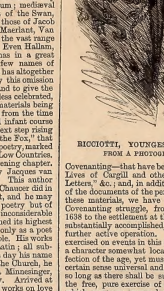
LITERATURE.



A Sketch of the History of Flemish Literature. By Octave Delepierre, LL.D. Murray.

In the present day the generic term "Flemish" has been, in popular parlance, considerably narrowed from its original signification. We are accustomed to associate the word more especially with the inhabitants and territory of Flanders, and with a Belgium only, whereas it formerly comprehended everything that belonged to the country which was the Netherlands, and the language called Flemish was that of Holland as well. This dialect is not the obscure remains of an extinct idiom, but is a dialect of the widely-spread Germanic tongue. It forms a part of the two powerful branches of this last idiom made use of along the coasts of the Northern and Baltic Seas, from Dunkirk to Konigsberg, and from Flensburg in Holstein to the Harz Mountains. It is called "Low Dutch" because it was, and is, spoken in the Low Countries and in Low Germany; while the other branches of the same mother tongue which extends over the higher and mountainous parts of those countries—in Switzerland, Austria, Saxony, are called "High Dutch." This is proved not only by the study of the general history of the literature of Europe, but by the fact that people in the north as well as in the south had formerly only one word to express their idiom—namely, "Dietsch," or "Deutsch." The word "Flemish" is posterior to the sixteenth century, and the word "Hollandsch," made use of to express the name of the language spoken in Holland, is altogether of modern origin. 'Till the end of the seventeenth century the idiom spoken in Holland, as has been before stated, as well as in Belgium, was called Flemish. In England we have only one word—"Dutch"—for the language spoken in Holland as well as in Flanders. It is very pointedly remarked by M. Delepierre that it is rather a curious fact that a country which has produced in modern times a very popular novel-writer, Victor Conscience, whose works have been translated into English, French, German, and Danish, and form part of every railway library, English or foreign; poets known all over Germany in olden times, as Van Duyse, Snellaert, Willem, &c.; a far-famed satirical poem, "Reinard the Fox," the model of which is principally cited in Flanders, the oldest manuscript known written in Low Dutch, and ascertained by the latest philologists to have to belong to Belgium; mediæval romances like "Floris and Blanchefleur," "The Knight of the Swan, &c.; fables, proverbs, and emblems in verse, such as those of Jacob Cats; historical rhymed chronicles like those of Melis Stoke, Van Helu, &c., should not occupy even the smallest place in the vast range of English belles lettres literature of Europe. Even Hallam, in his introduction to "The Literature of Europe," has in a great measure overlooked Dutch authors, quoting only a few names of European celebrities, and copying their errors, and he has altogether omitted Flemish writers and their works. It is to supply this omission that M. Delepierre has undertaken the work before us, and to give the English public a sketch of Flemish authors, more or less celebrated, from the twelfth century down to the present time, his materials being supplied from Flemish sources. During its earliest rise from the time of Charlemagne, Flemish literature ran through the usual infant course of traditionary ballads, and romances, and as soon as it began to stray rising to the dignity of epics. In the twelfth century "Renard the Fox," that epic of the people, as contradistinguished from the courtly epic, marked a remarkable epoch in the history of the literature of the Low Countries. Of the period thus indicated M. Delepierre treats in his opening chapter. We then come to the era which was inaugurated by the great van Maerlant in the latter part of the thirteenth century. This author occupies much the same position in Flemish literature as Dante did in that of England. Before him poetry was a vagrant art, and he may well be designated not only as the father of Flemish poetry but of Flemish letters. He was born at Damme, and was the contemporary poet of Flanders, at a time when that country had reached its highest point of prosperity and fame. He was distinguished not only as a poet but as philosopher and an orator. He wrote for the people. His works were read everywhere, studied and even translated into Latin; all subsequent writers acknowledged his influence, while to this day his name is still revered by his country. Originally destined for the Church, he took a distaste to the monastic life, and devoted himself to literature, composing and delivering political romances of chivalry. Arrived at a mature age, Van Maerlant gave up the composition of works on love and chivalry of the kind, and addressed himself to those of a profane history. He taught his countrymen physiology, medicine, and natural history; he, for the serious duties of man, and the Book of Wisdom the barrier which separated the educated classes from the people by adapting into his native tongue for their instruction the best works of the time. He undertook to sing for the people a record of encyclopædias long before that word was invented. He wrote it in verse, in order that its precepts might be more deeply engraved on the minds of all. It treated of men, of quadrupeds, of birds, of the marvels of the sea, of fishes, of serpents, of insects, of trees, of medicinal plants, of the vegetable kingdom, of minerals, of precious stones, of the seven metals, &c. After this he composed his greatest work, the "Historical Mirror," when, in four parts and thirty-one books, he gives the history of the world from the creation to the thirteenth century. Space fails us to give even the merest list of the works of this profound and prolific author, and we have dwelt thus on his name and writings as our necessarily brief notice on account of the striking position he occupies in the literature of his country. From Jean, first Duke of Brabant, who not only patronised literature but wrote verses himself, and Jean van Heelu, who assisted also in the last part of the thirteenth century, and Melis Stoke, who opens the fourteenth, we have in the work before us the whole chronicle of authors and works, scientific, legendary, dramatic, poetic, satiric, and biblical, traced rapidly and with a light touch, but yet with sufficient fulness, down to the present time, his long and ample list terminating with Willem, who is stated to have been the true personification, during more than a quarter of a century, of the Flemish literary movement; Ledeganck, the harvest of Flanders, and Conscience, who has been designated the Dickens of Belgium. There can be no doubt of the interest of this book, which opens a new and wide field for the consideration of the English inquirer into foreign letters. It is a praiseworthy, and, as we think, a successful, attempt to bring before the world the merits of Flemish literature, and to show that, though there were few to be cited to place that of its being essentially national.

Metaphysics; or the Philosophy of Consciousness, Phenomenal and Real. By Henry Longueville Mansel, B.D. This volume is, we presume, a reprint of the article entitled "Metaphysics" originally published in "The Encyclopædia Britannica." The plan on which the work was treated in the first instance, embracing metaphysics in the most comprehensive sense, but crowded into a limited space, rendered it necessary to attempt a general outline of a wide and copious degree, and subsequent sections, as this difficulty has remained to a great extent in the production of the treatise in its present form. Certain controversial questions, especially in the earlier part of the book, have been indicated rather than discussed; some hints have been given to stimulate and direct further inquiry. Notwithstanding these comparative defects, which are fully admitted by the author, and which were, under the circumstances, unavoidable, there can be little doubt but that this work will be of much service, not only to English readers a clearer apprehension of a subject which in this country has been much neglected and misunderstood, and which, into whatever errors and extravagances it may at times have fallen, yet has its foundation in some of the deepest needs of human nature, and its superstructure in some of the noblest monuments of human thought.



The Fifty Years' Struggle of the Scottish Covenanters, 1638-88. By James Dodd. Edmiston and Douglas.

This is a reprint of a course of lectures delivered in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Liverpool, and several other large towns. It does not pretend to be an exhaustive history of the very interesting period to which it refers, or property a history at all. It claims only to be a series of descriptive sketches, meant to represent in outline the successive phases of the Covenanting struggle, a struggle which bears with it admirable materials for a complete history, having as it has a beginning, a middle, and an end, all comprehended in a clearly-defined half century. The main body of the narrative has been based on the best authorities, contemporary or nearly contemporary with the events. Among those which have been consulted are Clarendon, Burnet, Kirkton, Woodrow, and Neal; Baillie's letters, Balfour's historical works, Bishop Guthrie's Memoirs, and Sect of Sectarians's "Scottish Statesmen;" "The Scottish Statutes," edited by Thomson; "Records of the Kirk," edited by Peterkin; the Stratford Papers; Dalrymple's Memoirs; contemporary journals, tracts, poems, and songs, edited by David Laing and other antiquarians; the various club and society publications as the Bannatyne Maitland, Spalding, Woodrow, &c. Among the writers—more especially Covenanting—that have been consulted are Naphthali, Patrick Walker's Lives of Cargill and others, Sheild's Life of Renwick, "Renwick's Letters," &c.; and, in addition to this, some examination has been made of the documents of the period in the State Paper Office. Gleaned from these materials, we have a survey of the whole fifty years of the Covenanting struggle, from the first swearing of the Covenant in 1638 to the settlement at the Revolution of 1688, when its objects were substantially accomplished, and when it ceased, therefore, to have any further active operation. Viewed in relation to the influence they exercised on events in this kingdom, the Covenanters, although having a character somewhat local and special, and tinged with the imperfection of the age, yet must be regarded as having also a character in a certain sense universal and perpetual, and interesting to all mankind so long as there shall be such things as the true love of liberty and the free, pure exercise of religious belief and worship. In a spirit which causes an approach to the consideration of the subject to bear with it the charm of the terms of chivalry and adventure, we have a record of the singular confederation of which the Covenant was the charter; and, despite of the sternness of principle and action which characterised its professors, there is an air of romance about their history which renders a book like the present welcome and agreeable.

Salmon-fishing in Canada. Edited by Colonel Alexander, 14th Regiment. Longman and Co.

Salmon-fishing has gradually become so associated in the Saxon mind with the Tweed and the Tay, to say nothing of Ballyshannon, that the Waltonite hardly knows where else to look in search of "a twenty-pound sensation." It will not, however, be any fault of our author if he is not tempted to spend one summer at least in exploring the rugged banks and unfrequented pools of the romantic and secluded Canadian rivers, or canoeing once in the American prophecies, to cast his lines over the clear waters of the rivers which empty themselves into the Bay of Chaleur. The programme for an adventurer of this species is fully sketched out in these pleasant pages. Having satisfactorily answered the question as to there being salmon-fishing in Canada, he discusses seriatim suitable salmon-flies, the mode of transit to the salmon rivers, and the peculiar features of each. This is all told in the form of an excursion, every phase of which is noted down, to the very words of the sermon which was preached to the party in their cutter-cabin one Sunday on the Saguenay, from the text of "I go a-fishing." Perhaps it had been better taste to omit the sermon, which is simply unappropriate, from page 140; but, with this exception, the rest of them, and especially the prefatory and letters, are remarkably clever and well executed. It has been truly said that the gist of a letter is often in its postscript. This is very much the case here, as the lecture on salmon and the appendix contain much useful matter of the book, and is, in fact, a long experience of American, emparalled English, salmon-fishing, which dates back to 1800. Independently of this lecture, the chapter which struck us most is that on whale-fishing in the St. Lawrence. The story of the chase, the take, and the towing home of the whale's head; and the captain of the whaler, when > in his pockets he made a grope,

> And then in the ruines of his ship he broke,
> Wherein nothing he bands with unusable
> In imperopitable water, seemed worthy of his blubber prize and the gallant Ellen Jane o Gaspé.

Garibaldi. An Operetta, in Two Acts. The Libretto by Rosalind the Music by H. F. Cowen. Boosey and Sons.

We have great pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to the above clever production. The music, consisting of songs, duets, and choruses, is entirely composed by Master H. Frederick Cowen, a child barely eight years of age. The fact of so open, rich beautiful and original melodies emanating from an infant is parallled in the history of music in the sole instance of the unrivalled Mozart. The opening song in act first, "Viva Garibaldi say," is a charming melody, full of vivacity, in 6-8 time; but the gem of the operetta is an air entitled "There is a silver spray," which contains all the germs of popularity. Garibaldi's address to his soldiers, "When trumpets and despots," in G major, is full of fire, and contrasts admirably with the tenderness of the song in the Andante. The duet introduced to the work is expianatory of the cause of its being published, and we can safely recommend the operetta for private theatricals, now so much the fashion. It is prettily got up in the form of an album, and would be an acceptable giftbook to any young lady.

RICCIOTTI GARIBALDI.

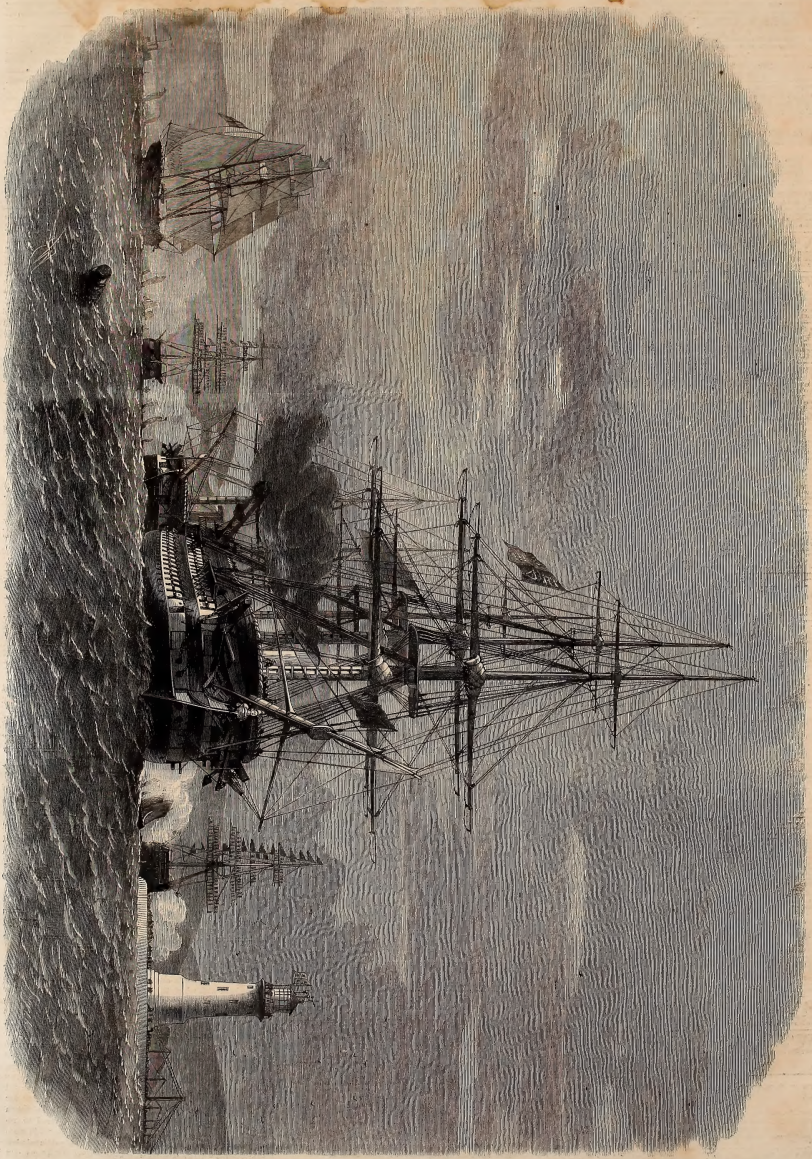
Last week we had the pleasure of giving striking likenesses of Genera Garibaldi and of his alter ego, General Türr. Our present Number contains the Portrait of Ricciotti Garibaldi's youngest son during his education in this country. Ricciotti Garibaldi has just attained his thirteenth year, and for two years of age at the period of the decease of his mother in the disastrous month from October 1859. He was brought from Italy five years since by a friend of General Garibaldi, and is now at the New Brighton College, near Liverpool, of which Dr. Poggi is Principal.

CHURCH EXTENSION IN ISLINGTON.

On Friday, June 29, the foundation-stone of a new church, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated at Hornsey-rise, in the parish of Islington, was laid by Mr. Alfred Morrison, the banker. After prayers had been read by the Rev. J. Lees, M.A., Incumbent of St. Mary's, addresses were delivered by the Rev. Daniel Wilson, M.A., Vicar of Islington, the Rev. Sir Culling Eardley, Bart., and Mr. Alfred Morrison. The Rev. Daniel Wilson stated that he recollected when there were but two churches in Islington—namely, the parish church and a chapel-of-ease; and gentlemen sat down, addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. Ochen, the recently-appointed Archdeacon of Whitechapel; the Rev. R. Cromwell, the future Incumbent of the district; Mr. Warliers, Mr. Petter, and others; and subscriptions amounting to £300 were announced as the result of the day's proceedings.

St. Mary's Church will be in the Decorated style of the fourteenth century. The arrangement of the plan is that of a nave with north and south aisles, north and south transepts, and chancel. The entire length internally will be 103 ft. 4 in.; the width of the church across the transepts 71 ft. 8 in.; and the width of nave and side aisles, 52 ft. 8 in.; the height of the nave, 48 ft.; and the height of the tower and spire 150 ft. It will be substantially built, the exterior being of Kentish ragstone, with Bath stone dressings, and will accommodate on the ground floor 750 persons. It is not intended to erect galleries at present, but provision has been made in the arrangement of the plan for their erection if required hereafter. They will occupy the north, west and last transepts only, leaving the nave and the side aisles throughout free and unincumbered. The further accommodation will be for 270 more. The church is now being erected from the design and under the direction of Mr. A. D. Gough, of Lancaster-place, Strand; the contractor for the works being Mr. G. J. Carter, of Hornsey-road.

VISIT OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES TO CANADA.



This important and interesting national event, the anticipations of which have engrossed the public attention for some time past, has at length been partially realised. On Monday, the 9th inst., his Royal Highness, accompanied by his august father, the Prince Consort, arrived in Plymouth Sound in the Victoria and Albert yacht, her Majesty having accompanied them part of the journey in the Fairy.

By seven o'clock many hundreds of persons had assembled on the Hoe, as well as on the ramparts of the citadel. The Sound presented a most animated appearance, innumerable boats, yachts, and vessels, crowded with expectant sightseers, covered the expanse of water, which was as smooth as an inland lake. The men-of-war were dressed with flags from stem to stern. Some distance outside the Breakwater was seen the Channel Fleet, with sails all set, and lighted up by the setting sun. At ten minutes after seven the entrance of the Royal yacht into the Sound was announced by a Royal salute from the Hercules and the citadel guns.

As soon as she was brought to her anchorage Rear-Admiral Sir T. S. Pasley, at present in command of the Channel Squadron (Sir Alexander Milne, being absent on leave), and other naval officials, with Major-General Hutchinson, in military command of the western district, with his Staff and other of the military officials, came on board to pay their respects to the Royal visitors. The Corporation of the borough of Devonport, at which place the Prince's Government house was placed, proceeded on board to present an address. The Mayor, N. Wilson, Esq., and the Recorder, C. Saunders, Esq., first proceeded to the Royal yacht to ascertain the precise time the Prince's reception of the address. This known, a prearranged signal was given, and the other members of the Corporation left the chief magistrate's and when all were on board the yacht they were ushered into the grand saloon, where his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, attended by the Duke of Newcastle, Lieutenant-General Bruce, and Captain Grey, received them. The Recorder then read a loyal address, to which the Prince made a suitable reply. The Corporation withdrew.

About half-past eight his Royal Highness embarked on board H.M.S. Hero (91 guns), Captain Seymour, C.B., and at seven the following morning, accompanied by the Ariadne frigate, under salutes from the St. George and Emerald, the citadel, and a battery on Mount Edgcumbe, left the Sound. The Channel fleet at this time lay southwest of the Eddystone, and about four miles off the port. As the Hero approached them they opened into two lines, and the Hero passed between them and took the lead with a fair wind down the Channel.

His Royal Highness the Prince Consort returned to Osborne under similar salutes at four o'clock the same morning.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1869.

THE successful termination of the first real voyage of the Great Eastern steam-ship has been duly chronicled. The enthusiasm with which this grand specimen of naval architecture has been received at New York perhaps appears to us, reading the account of it quietly and at a distance from the scene, a little extravagant. But, on the whole, it does not seem as if it exceeded in reality that grand triumphal progress which the Great Ship made down the River Thames on the occasion when she first left her moorings at Deptford. Subsequent events somewhat abated the interest, if it did not diminish enthusiasm, in the Great Eastern; and her departure from this country was so quiet and undemonstrative that it passed almost without notice. There can be little doubt that the fact of her having performed her voyage to America, although it was somewhat tentatively conducted, will tend to re-establish the value of the enterprise and the new era in navigation and commerce which she represents in the public mind of this country. Her trial-trips, in the strict sense of the term, will soon be over, and on her return to England the time will have arrived when she must be placed in the van of our vast merchant fleets, and commence that career which we have always believed she was by nature meant for, but which we believe is destined to create a revolution in our import and export trade. We learn that through all the admiration which the Great Eastern has excited in the United States there has run a thrill of jealousy, from the fact that she is the product of English skill and skill in ship-building rather than of American go-a-headism. This is natural enough in a country where the construction of ships is carried to such a pitch of perfection, and where improvement is always on the move. All we can say is that, if our American brethren can produce a ship like the Great Eastern, or a better one, we shall be glad to see her. As it was, the fortunate creators and possessors of a vessel such as the world never yet saw, and which is not to be considered as a gigantic toy, but as an emblem and a type of advancing civilisation.

There is one fact connected with the Great Eastern which ought not to be forgotten, and that is, that she has got rid of a minor trouble of life, which all remedies have hitherto failed to touch,—the least-practised sea-voyagers can cross the Atlantic on board of her without suffering from sea-sickness.

LORD CLYDE has returned in safety and in health to his native land. This news will be received throughout the length and breadth of the kingdom with an unqualified gratification over which few will linger very long, for, when the first sensation of pleasure is over, the inquiry will instantly succeed—what national recognition of the services of the saviour of India is to be made? Before we know, the colonelcy of a noble regiment awaiting Lord Clyde's acceptance; and this is well. But a military honour, however appropriate, very inadequately expresses the feeling of the nation. We wish not only to testify our sense of his military genius, which has been so magnificently displayed both in his strategy and in his personal resolution, to Lord Clyde as steps of Wellington by casting away the lives of no soldiers who could be preserved by the employment of elaborate tactics instead of dashing movements, but we also desire to let the world comprehend that we appreciate the grand result of Lord Clyde's campaigns, the crushing down of a monster revolt, and the salvation of a mighty kingdom. Therefore the people will look with impatience to the conduct of their leaders. Surely an early day will be fixed upon which Lord Clyde shall receive the personal thanks of Parliament. What next honour may be conferred upon him will perhaps proceed from the Sovereign. At present it may be noted that the rank which has been given to the preserver of India is simply that which is conferred upon a lucky lawyer, or a rich landlord or fundowner, who has voted consistently with his party. The Libro d'Oro of England will, it may be hoped, be again opened for a new inscription almost as soon as Lord Clyde. What form popular homage to the veteran hero may assume it is premature to consider; but the City—ever ready to rush to the foot of every kind of greatness, real or fictitious—will, we trust, display its hospitality upon an occasion when it can do so of the highest appliance of the art.

China is elsewhere attended to, and we need only mention here that Parliament has been apprised by Mr. Gladstone that a tax on spirits is the only new imposition which will be asked for between this and next April. The paper duty, which it has been proposed to tax, is to be applied towards the expenses of the China war. Lord Fermoy, on Tuesday, made an attempt to follow up the resolutions of Lord Palmerston by a motion for committing the House of Commons to "action," but the Premier moved the previous question," which Mr. Disraeli described as a "shabby" evasion. It was, however, carried by a majority of 40. The great measure of the Session (the Bankruptcy Bill) has been withdrawn, as also has the London Corporation Bill. In other respects the Parliamentary week has not been very interesting; but the Commons have been sitting most patiently and unremittingly, and trying to get over as large an arrear of business which accumulates fearfully about this period of the Session and calls for the fatal Herodian operation which Lord Palmerston is now meditating.

From Syria the news has been worse and worse. The savage Druses have been permitted to assail the Christians, where there has been a terrible massacre of the Christians, with the evident connivance of the Turks. Children of the tenderest age have been slaughtered in the most revolting manner by the ruffianly insurgents, and women in great numbers have also been victims. It will be necessary to take the most energetic steps and to punish most if Christian life is in future to be safe in the scenes especially hallowed in Christian minds. Something like a crusade is more than hinted at by indignant writers on the Continent. But, whatever course is taken, it must be a decisive one. Any Eastern question is so complicated by consideration of the known views and desires of Russia and France that a false step is dreaded by all statesmen; but it is impossible that civilised nations can continue to permit the shores of the Mediterranean to be stained with massacre. A solemn compact between the great Powers for an expedition that should utterly break up the Druses, after which Turkey should garrison the country and bind herself to a system of military police, would seem to straightforward persons a means of ending this scandal to the humanity of the age; but such a scheme is too devoid of the tortuous element to be tolerable in the eyes of diplomacy. The Minie rifle, properly directed, would clear those mountains and valleys in two months of determined action.

For once, a long-expected phenomenon was seen to considerable advantage. The great eclipse was very fairly seen, though the astronomers have complaints against the clouds. The effect of the obscuration was very palpable, and a certain ghastliness of light was for a short time manifest. There will be nothing so considerable as this eclipse until Christmas ten years hence, and after that we shall have to wait until 1887, so that people may as well preserve their recollections of the event of last Wednesday. The Astronomer Royal, who took for a pleasant party to Bilbao to observe the effect where the grand shadow fell, is stated to have had an excellent view, and his report will be looked for with interest by the scientific world.

Russia seems resolved to pursue her new and enlightened policy. A decree against intolerance has been issued, by which it is enacted that foreign merchants, hitherto exposed to the greatest disadvantages by the guild system of the country, shall be admitted to trade on the same terms as natives. If the bureaucracy of Russia will permit the views of the Emperor to be fairly carried out, the boon will be a very great one; and his Majesty has shown, in other cases, that he has much of the determination of his father. The fatal corruption which pervades every class in the empire, and which may be explained, though it cannot be defended, by the miserable pittance which is five far beyond the means afforded by their salaries, is the deadly opponent of the free, open, and honest commerce of French and English mercantile men. At no step of a transaction in which officialism can interfere—and there is almost nothing done in Russia without that interference—does a man of the world dream of success without a bribe administered with a certain adroitness to the titled official, but laid unhesitatingly in the usually very dirty hand of the hungry-looking subordinate, and in both cases accepted as matter of course. Such a commerce as the new ukase would indicate must be utterly opposed to the whole system at work, and there will be doggedly opposed by the crowd of influential persons whose champagne and smart carriages are provided by corruption.

A curious scene occurred early in the week, when Mr. Disraeli was obliged to appear in a Police Court and answer the most insulting charges, and to hear Sir Thomas Wilde "call him with a grievance," for whom, if there is not the plea of partial irresponsibility, we know no other. He demanded of Mr. Disraeli why he did not take the oath in a Jewish fashion, and, being apprised that the honourable gentleman was a Christian, repeated the question in the most offensive terms. Finally, however, he received from the person whom he was persecuting one of the keenest and most cutting of rebukes, delivered in the gentlest manner, and which went into even the pachydermatous hide of the slanderer, himself charged with publishing the most scandalous libels. Such scenes are momentarily vexatious to individuals, but are inestimable from the working of a sound and wise system of law which confronts witnesses, however distinguished, with accused persons, however notorious. And in this case the dialectic victory was completely with the respectable man.

THE COURT.

On Saturday last the Queen and the Prince Consort, accompanied by Princess Louise and Prince Arthur, drove to Frogmore. The Earl of Clarendon and Lady Constance Villiers, who had arrived on a visit on the previous day, were also in the carriage accompanying her Majesty. The Royal dinner party in the evening included the Duchess of Kent, Princess Alice, the Earl of Clarendon and Lady Constance Villiers, Lady A. Bruce, Captain and Mrs. F. On Monday the Prince Consort left Osborne for Buckingham Palace to preside at a meeting of the Royal Commission for the Great Exhibition of Scotsmorton from the Royal yacht Fairy, and travelled by a special train to Paddington, the Queen accompanying her Majesty to Slough. At a quarter to four the Prince left Buckingham Palace, and his Royal Highness arrived at Osborne shortly before five o'clock. Commander Rouse, Earl Spencer, Lord Waterpark, Major-General the Hon. C. Grey, Colonel Bruce, and Mr. Abraham Lincoln, Colonel Powell, and Colonel Ponsonby, His Royal Highness returned to the palace at five o'clock, and received a great many despatches and letters, which required his attention. Lord Granville's possessions, who were severally introduced by the Right Hon. T. Milner Gibson. Lord Granville, Lord Kimberley, Lord Clarendon, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of Winchester, the Duchess of Marlborough-Stredit, and afterwards went to the South Kensington Museum, to which the Queen had given her patronage, and to the Royal Opera, Covent-garden with his presence in the evening.

To the Queen's dinner party on Tuesday Princess Alice and Helena, drove to West Cowes and honoured the Prince and Princess Leiningen with a visit.

On Tuesday the Prince Consort presided at a meeting of the International Statistical Congress in Somerset House. On the same afternoon his Royal Highness left Buckingham Palace, and arrived at Osborne shortly after six o'clock. The Queen and Princess Alice met his Royal Highness at the entrance.

On Thursday the Queen and the Prince Consort, accompanied by the Princesses Alice and Helena, left Osborne, and crossed the Solent to Portsmouth in the Fay. The Prince Consort afterwards visited the Prince and Princess of Leiningen, at Norris Castle.

According to present arrangements the Court will proceed to Scotland on Tuesday next, the Prince Consort intending to review the Scottish Volunteers on reviewing the Rifle Volunteers of that division of the United Kingdom on the following day.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will remain until the close of next week at Osborne as well for her health, inserting afterwards her Royal Highness goes to Laurieton House, the Duke of Sutherland's grand seat, in Perthshire, for a month.

The Marchioness of Drogheda left town a few days since to join the noble Marquis at Moore Park, Farnham, near Ireland. The noble Marquis and Marchioness purpose going on a cruise to Iceland shortly.

The Countess of Dundonald, who had come to England to attend Lord Cochrane on his elevation to the peerage, has now left Easton Grey for Boulogne. Her Ladyship has lately suffered severely in health.

Lady Charles Wellesley and family are passing the season at Walmer Castle.

A marriage is arranged to take place between Mr. George Douglas Brownrigg, eldest son of Sir Robert Brownrigg, Bart., and Miss Pamela Rushout, second daughter of Sir Charles Rushout, of Sezincote House, Gloucestershire.—A marriage is also arranged between Colonel Charles Baring, of Crimean celebrity, and Miss Helen Graham, third daughter of the Right Hon. Sir James Graham.

THE PRINCESS ROYAL.—A letter from Berlin of the 14th says:—"The English Minister at this Court, Lord Bloomfield, returned to Berlin this morning from Bagnaux. The immediate cause of His Excellency's return was the approaching accouchement of the Princess Frederick William, on which occasion the Princess Royal of England is officially required. This event is expected to take place in a very short time. Sir James Clarke, accordingly, on her Majesty Queen Victoria's behalf, has been expected to arrive at Potsdam to-day or to-morrow from London."

His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will visit Cork next week, to attend the annual dinner of the National Agricultural Show

The Rev. Joseph Sortain, of Brighton, died somewhat suddenly, on Monday last, after a very long indisposition.

The entire disposable force of Royal Artillery in garrison at Woolwich was on Tuesday paraded, on foot, in front of the official quarters, in a body of 1100 men, for the purpose of witnessing the annual distribution of good-conduct medals.

Dr. Ballantyne, of the College at Benares, the eminent Sanscrit scholar and candidate for the Boden Professorship at Oxford, has received the appointment of Librarian at the East India House, vacant through the death of Professor H. H. Wilson.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

At the Thames Police Court on Monday a summons was granted against Rosier for disturbing the clergyman officiating at St. George's-in-the-East on Sunday evening.

Mr. Hall, a Kensington fishmonger, was fined 10s. and costs by the Hammersmith police magistrates on Saturday for using insulting language to Mr. Ernest Jones.

Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar has been fined 3d. and costs for refusing to pay toll for his chaise passing through Kensington-gate. The Prince was going on duty in uniform, and was of opinion that this would exempt his carriage.

The Surrey Steam Flour-mills, Valentine-place, Blackfriars-road, were visited with considerable fire, which, however, was turned to the ground on Wednesday morning. Some adjoining houses were considerably damaged.

THE SPECTACLE-MAKERS' COMPANY.—On Tuesday evening the members of this ancient civic fraternity, whose corporate existence has attended every one of the sovereigns of England, dined together to the number of about 200, in commemoration of their incorporation.

GEORGE-YARD, LOMBARD-STREET.—There are at length appears to be some hope that the unhappy disturbances in the parish of St. George-in-the-East will be brought to a satisfactory termination. Mr. Ryan has obtained leave of absence for twelve months; and a friend of the Bishop of London has consented to assume the responsibility of the vacant charge.

The Crystal Palace annual archery meeting commenced on Wednesday, and was concluded on Thursday, in the cricket-ground at the lower part of the park. Upwards of 100 guineas were awarded by the Crystal Palace Company as prizes—the highest for gentlemen being £16, and for ladies £10, for the two days' competition. The latter was carried off by Miss Mitchell, all the ten archers of the kingdom.

A grand floral exhibition was opened on Wednesday afternoon at the Floral Hall, Covent-garden, and visited by a considerable number of persons. The display consisted of roses, fuchsias, and dahlias, all of which were in great abundance. The roses were especially profuse, of great variety, and for the most part in rare excellence. A gigantic rose mound was formed in the centre of the building.

POLICE MAGISTRATES.—The following arrangements, consequent on the resignation of Mr. Bingham, have been made:—Police Courts:—Mr. Tyrwhitt, of the Clerkenwell Police Court, succeeds Mr. Bingham at Westminster; Mr. Knox, of Westminster, will shortly be removed to the Clerkenwell Court; and Mr. John Henry Barker has been appointed to the vacancy at Marlborough-street, caused by the late illness of Mr. D'Eyncourt.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 935 boys and 919 girls (in all 1754 children) were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1859-69 the average number was 1486.—In the week ending the 24th inst. the deaths of 1076 persons were registered. This was 116, exhibiting an increase on that of the previous week, which was 919. For the corresponding week in the ten years 1859-68 the average number of deaths was 1060, after correction for increase of population, is 1104.

At the Old Bailey sessions, on Tuesday a tailor, named George Drake, was fined 20s. for assaulting Mr. Baxter, M.P. The ben. complaint was on the 29th ult., in the House of Commons, when he had thrw c'oths, when the prisoner, seizing him by the collar, accused him of having stolen his coat, which act Mr. Baxter denied. The prisoner was then at a distance, when a police officer appeared, and took the man in custody. Drake said he was drunk at the time, and was sorry for what he had done.

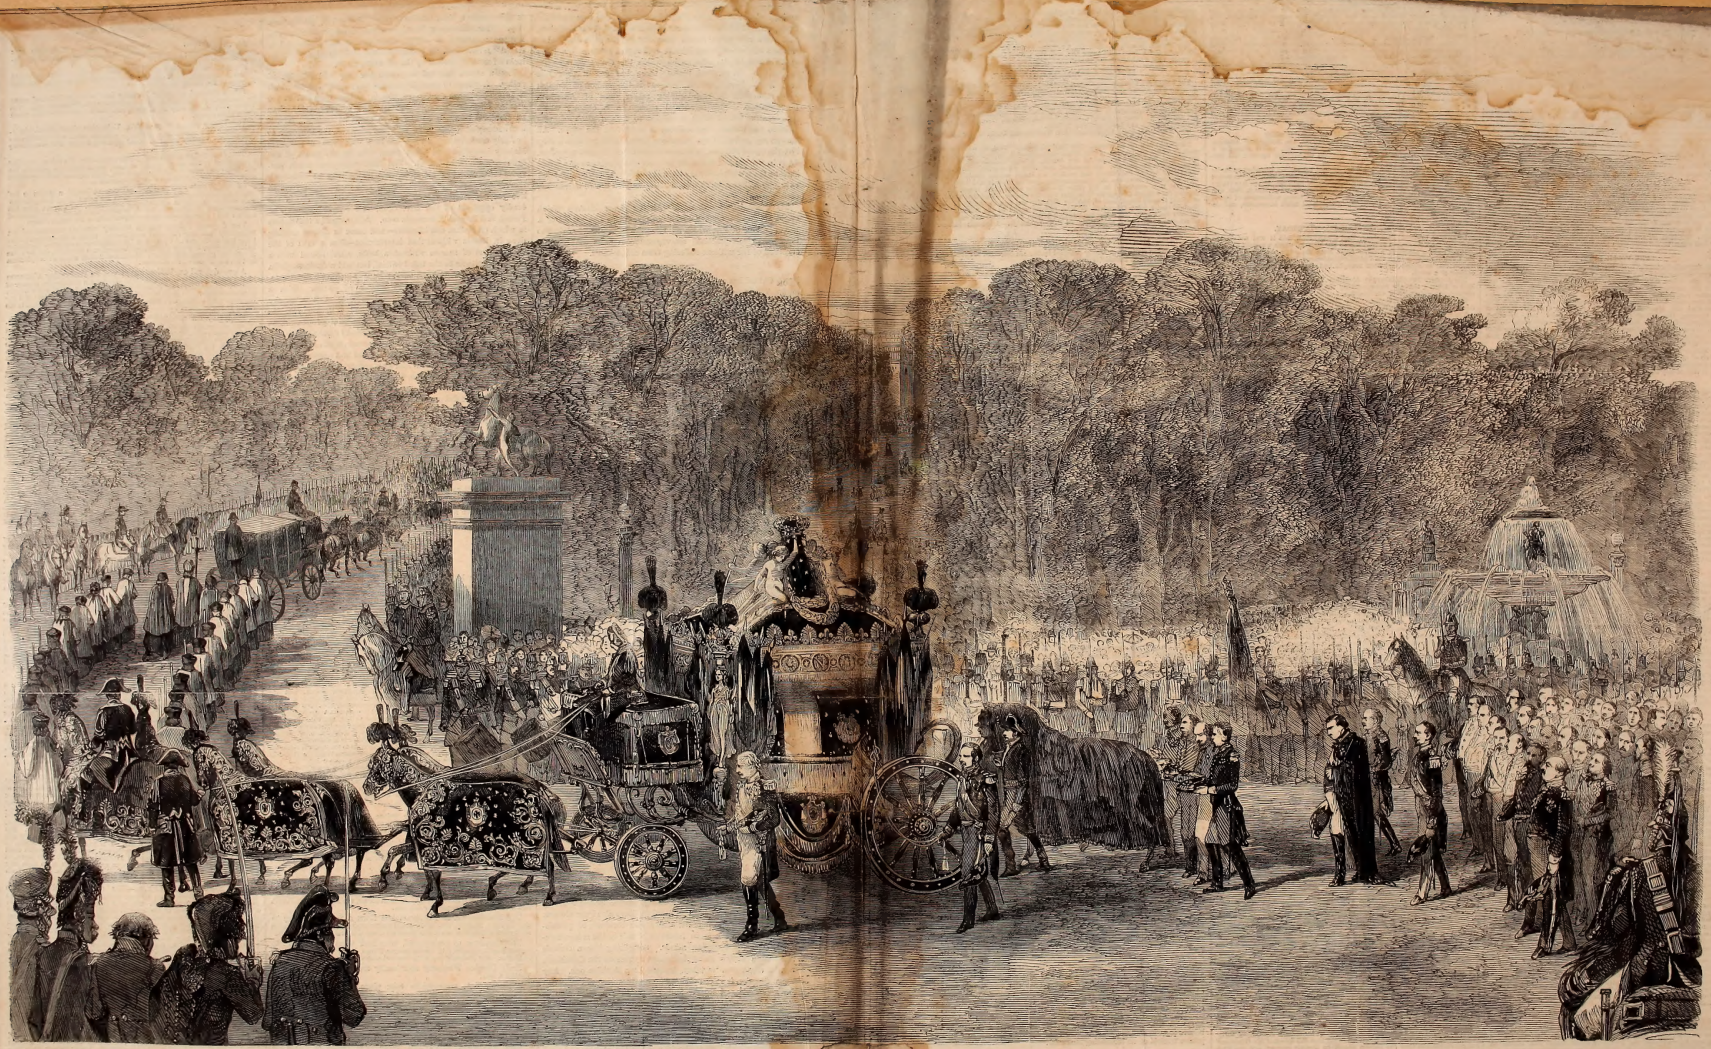
A HIGHWAY ROBBERY ON HAMPTON COMMON was the subject of a trial at the Central Criminal Court last Saturday. The prosecutor, on the night of the 17th of June, was returning across the common on his way to Hampton, where he resides, when three men came up to him, one of whom went in front of him, and the other two on either side. Immediately his pockets were rifled, and he was robbed of a sovereign. One of the men, named Thomas Wyman, was convicted, and he now underwent the infliction of seven years' servitude.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—A NEW DEGREE.—On Monday an examination commenced at Burlington House for a new degree, which has been established by the University, with the view of forming a test for Bachelor of Science. The subjects fixed upon by the Council in which the candidates are required to be somewhat extensively acquainted before the first Bachelor of Science examination will be entitled to present themselves for the degree of Doctor of Science, which will also be the first to be awarded. The Doctor of Science, the examination for which will take place annually within the first fourteen days of June each year.

GENEALOGICAL AND HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN.—The annual meeting of this society was held on Tuesday evening at the Earl of Rosslyn's, Upper Grosvenor-street, Mr. Hyde Clarke in the chair, and a crowded. Lord Rivers, one of the vice-presidents, took the chair, and the vice-chair was occupied by Mr. Hyde Clarke, the honorary secretary. The report of the proceedings was read and unanimously adopted. The Rev. Thomas Hugo read a paper on Bromham, Wilts, and Mr. Hyde Clarke on the Rev. Thomas Hugo, a treatise on Anglo-Saxon History, Heraldry, and the Chronicles of Bromham still preserved to us. The Rev. Thomas Hugo, in the absence of Mr. Hyde Clarke, read a discourse on a half-crown considered historically and archæologically. Dr. Pia, of Vienna, was elected a member of the society.

BANQUET AT THE MANSION HOUSE TO HER MAJESTY'S MINISTERS.—On Wednesday evening the Egyptian Hall at the Mansion House was thrown open for the entertainment of the Ministers of the Crown. Upwards of 90 of the nobility and gentry, including the whole of the Cabinet Ministers and a considerable portion of the members of the House of Commons, dinner supplied by Messrs. Ring and Brymer, his Lordship's purveyors. Among the guests were the Archbishop of Canterbury, who shortly withdrew from their grave demeanour and singular costume; and his Excellency Hassan Fehmi Bey, the Turkish Ambassador, who, in his national dress, was the object of great interest and curiosity. There was also an immense variety of naval, military, and civic uniforms, and the fair sex were in full dress and formed one of the most brilliant parties of the season. Addresses were delivered by the Duke of Buccleuch and Mr. Gladstone, which were loudly cheered.

PROPOSED CONCENTRATION OF THE LAW COURTS.—The report of the Commissioners on the selection of sites for the new courts of law has just been issued. The Attorney-General's scheme for appropriating the entire area between Carey-street and the Strand is considered best by the commissioners, who are unanimously in favour of adopting that scheme. They propose that the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, and Equity Registrars' (but the law courts, instead of sitting at Westminster, Guildhall, and Lincoln's-inn-fields, shall be established in the new buildings. The site is midway between the Temple, Lincoln's-inn, and Serjeant's-inn, where most of the chief practitioners have their offices. The scheme will not be adopted by the House of Commons, that the first building to be erected shall be one for the Court of Appeal in Chancery, to relieve the House of Lords of these departments stand in most of proper accommodation more than any other. This could be accomplished throughout in two years from the time, providing that a bill be passed this Session.



CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL.—The annual meeting of the governors of Charing-cross Hospital was held on Wednesday, at the hospital, Mr. Stuart in the chair. The report congratulated the subscribers on the generous support which the institution had received during the year; subscriptions and donations had greatly increased. In the course of the past year 999 in-patients were admitted into the hospital, and 7,000 out-patients or sick persons were admitted for relief, as a cost of £2999 8s. 10d.—the greater part of which has been discharged. The report stated that 1,000 sick persons had experienced the benefits of the institution since its commencement in 1818. Within the last twelve months £4,000 had been spent in the enlargement of the hospital. The total income for the year from subscriptions, donations, legacies, and dividends, amounting to £3,000, leaving a deficiency of £644 15s. 4d., which was to meet the necessary expenses and the purchase of stock, &c., a balance of £241 1s. 6d. was left in the treasurer's hands. It was proposed to increase the size of the theatre then to complete the erection of the children's ward, and that increase the expenditure of the year to £4,000. The report was then unanimously seconded by Mr. Crisp, the report was adopted. After addresses from Mr. Worthington, Mr. Hodgkinson, Mr. Mr. Fisk, &c., the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

Colonel the Hon. Sir Allan Napier Macnab, Bart., commanding 7th Military District, Upper Canada, and Colonel the Hon. Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, commanding Lower Canada, have been appointed to be Aides-de-Camp to the Queen, with the honorary rank of Colonel in the Army.

Sir A. Malet, Bart., her Britannic Majesty's Envoy at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, has presented a silver goblet of exquisite design to the Schützen Club of that city, commemorative of the Queen's visit to the shot for by the members of the corps. The contest for it is to take place on Wednesday next, and will last two days.

The Queen has appointed A. P. Burt, Esq., to be Civil Commissioner and Stipendiary Quarter Sessions for the Colony of Western Australia; F. S. Wigley, Esq., to be Attorney-General for the Island of St. Christopher; J. Palmer, Esq., to be Treasurer of the Island of St. Lucia; and M. Hy. Esq., to be Treasurer of the Island of Dominica.

BELGIUM.—The Belgian Senate has terminated the discussion of the bill which abolishes the Octroi Dues. It rejected an amendment, proposed by M. D'Anethan, having for its object to give the law a temporary character, and to maintain the Octroi Dues for a period of five years. The vote on the ensemble of the measure was 37 votes in its favour to 15 against. There were eight abstentions. Consequently, from the present time there are no Octroi duties in Belgium.

THE FUNERAL PROCESSION OF THE LATE PRINCE JEROME CROSSING THE PLACE DE LA CONCORDE, PARIS.

RENCH JEROME BONAPARTE, the brother of Napoleon I., and the ncle of Napoleon III., was buried with great pomp in the Chapel f the Invalides at Paris, on the 3rd of July. The ceremony as conducted throughout with all the éclat of the present Empire, nd nothing was wanting in the ensemble of the funeral to render imposing to the multitude, at all times easily impressionable to rand displays. It cannot be denied that the occasion was one of reat importance as a Bonapartist demonstration. The only remaining ink of the first French Empire had passed away in the full zenith of he power of the Second; and the brother of the great Emperor, more ortunate than the founder of the Napoleon dynasty, had outlived ethronement and exile to assist in the consolidation of the fortunes of his brother's house, and the increase of French influence in the councils of Europe. In the events which have led to the present state of things in France, le vieux Jerome, as he was affectionately called, played no mean part, and the crowds at his funeral were therefore attracted by something more than a mere scenic cortége—they were the living streamlets of a thousand souvenirs swelled into a grand Napoleonic demonstration.

From a very early hour in the morning of the interment all the quarters of Paris were in motion, and by ten o'clock the line of the procession from the Palais Royal (the late Prince's town residence) to the Invalides was duly formed, the right-hand side being occupied throughout by eighteen battalions of the National Guard, and the left-hand by a vast number of troops of the Imperial Guard and of the Line. At eleven o'clock, amidst the firing of the cannon from the Invalides, and the tolling of all the church bells in Paris, and in the presence of a large body of the clergy and the members of the Imperial family, the coffin was placed on the funeral-car by a dozen of the Cent Gardes. The procession then started slowly on its way. The hearse, drawn by six richly-caparisoned horses, each bearing a cloth ornamented with silver trimmings and the arms of the French Empire, was that which had already served for the interments of the Duke de Berry and the Duke of Orleans.* It was surmounted by a crown sustained by four angels in silver; on the four corners and in front of the funereal drapery were the arms of the Empire and those of the deceased Prince, embroidered in gold and silver; flags forming trophies mixed with white feathers completed its decoration. The pallbearers were Marshal Vaillant, M. Troplong, M. Fould, and Admiral Hamelin. The hearse was preceded by an avant guard of Chasseurs, a detachment of the Cent Gardes, the members of the deceased's household, his carriage, the clergy of St. Roch, with the Emperor's Bishop-Almoner at their head. All the ecclesiastics were on foot, and each bore a lighted wax taper. The funeral pile was followed immediately by the favourite horse of the defunct, saddled, led by two grooms, and covered with a long black veil. Then came the officers of State bearing on cushions the arms and insignia of his late Imperial Highness; and at a certain distance from them the chief mourner, Prince Napoleon, in the costume of a General of Division, almost concealed by a large mourning-cloak. On the right and left respectively of the Prince, who seemed absorbed in filial grief, were Prince Murat and Marshal Pelissier, who preceded a vast crowd of marshals, general officers, and functionaries of the Emperor's household. This is the part of the procession shown in our Engraving. The remainder consisted of the Senate, the Council of State, the Legislative Body, a large deputation of the old men decorated with the St. Helena medal, three Imperial mourning-coaches (one belonging to the Emperor, one to the Princess Mathilde, and one to the deceased), more Cent Gardes, twenty ordinary mourning-coaches, and a long stream of troops, the cortége being closed by a formidable body of cavalry. The aspect of the multitude assembled on the line of procession was calm and respectful; the number was almost as great as when the remains of Napoleon I. were brought to Paris from St. Helena during the reign of Louis Philippe.

Of an event of such dynastic importance we felt bound to furnish a record in our pictorial collection. Our Illustration is from a drawing made by M. Beaucé during the passage of the cortége across the Place de la Concorde, the exact details of the hearse having been copied from a photograph taken by M. Richebourg, the Government photographer, who kindly placed it at the disposal of our Artist. Let us not forget to note the attendance at the funeral of a number of the remaining veterans of La Vieille Garde, a few of whom are shown in the left-handcorner of our Illustration.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY, JULY 13.

The following bills were read a third time and passed—viz., Criminal Lunatic Asylums; Jenkin Estate (Aberlarner), Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Ebenezer Park, Tenison's Charity, and Local Government Supplemental Bills.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY, JULY 13.

The House met at twelve o'clock, and was occupied until four o'clock with the consideration of the Trusts and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

At the evening sitting,

Mr. KINGLAKE asked whether all the eight Powers, as well as Switzerland and Sardinia, had agreed to submit the points in dispute to Conference on the 20th ultimo at the official seat of Vienna, and whether there was any pre-liminary understanding between the Powers at the head of which the Conference would take place.

Mr. B. DISRAELI: I do not know whether her Majesty's Government are in possession of any information relative to the reported agreement between the Emperors of Russia and Austria. It was generally known that the Emperor Napoleon had proposed to give Lombardy back to Austria on condition that Austria should cede Venetia also in an exchange upon the Russian principle.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that the Emperor of the French had suggested three modes of settling the Savoy question, one of which was by means of a Conference. Her Majesty's Government acceded to this proposal. No Power but England had, up to the present time, given a definitive answer; but he had no doubt that in other Powers would be overcome the difficulties in regard to a Conference. With regard to the alleged agreement between the Emperors of Austria and France he had heard rumours of the same kind alluded to by the hon. member; but from all the information which he had received on the subject he had come to the conclusion that there was no foundation for such statements.

THE PAPER DUTY.

Mr. WHALLEY called attention to the paper duty, and asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was the intention of the Government to relieve the paper trade of the duty of 1½d. per lb. In order to remove one great obstacle to peace with China, the British Plenipotentiary he instructed not to insist upon the fulfilment of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, and to withdraw from China a representative of her Majesty should reside at Pekin. The hon. member said it he believed that the trade with China should continue there would be a demand for 45,000,000 beyond the £5,000,000 already vested in aid of the expenses of that unnecessary expedition. He also asked whether the Egyptian and other eminent men in support of the proposition, and urged upon the Government the importance of withdrawing from the treaty engagements which would never be willingly assented to by the Chinese Government.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that he did not think the repeal of the tax could be given up, inasmuch as it had already been agreed to and sanctioned by the Emperor of China. He could not say as Ambassador from Russia at present resident at Pekin with the full acquiescence of the Chinese Government, and that he was not aware that the withdrawal of the Treaty of Tien-tsin by which a representative of her Majesty should reside at Pekin. The hon. member is at liberty to state that the trade with China should continue there would be a demand for 45,000,000 beyond the £5,000,000 already vested in aid of the expenses of that unnecessary expedition. He also asked whether the Egyptian and other eminent men in support of the proposition, and urged upon the Government the importance of withdrawing from the treaty engagements which would never be willingly assented to by the Chinese Government.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that he did not think the repeal of the tax could be given up, inasmuch as it had already been agreed to and sanctioned by the Emperor of China. He could not say as Ambassador from Russia at present resident at Pekin with the full acquiescence of the Chinese Government at, and he was not aware that the withdrawal of the Treaty of Tien-tsin by which a representative of her Majesty should reside at Pekin.

A long debate ensued, in the course of which the policy of the course of which Sir James Elphinstone, Mr. Bright, Mr. Roebuck, and others, expressed their opinions that the tax was not stood, would involve this country in a great serious financial embarrassments.

ON SUPPLY.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in consequence of the lateness of the hour, postponed the Committee of Ways and Means of taking the annual vote for the China war until Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

On the motion of the Earl of CHICHESTER the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill, which was in Committee, was rejected.

SAVOY AND NICE.—In the House of Lords, the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, in moving for the production of letter addressed by the Foreign Office to Lord Wellington in 1814, relating to the military frontier of Savoy, referred to the Lord J. Russell, Lord Cowley, on the 5th of May last, had already brought forward the subject of the annexation of the neutralised provinces of Savoy to France, and Lord Cowley's reply thereto. He expressed a hope that the proposed conference would lead to so good result.—Lord WODEHOUSE, in agreeing to the motion, said that the Government had asked for a conference, but the British Government could not but consent to send a representative to it.—The Marquis of NORMANBY said that Lord J. Russell's despatches were not to be found.—Lord STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, after complimenting Switzerland on the attitude which she had assumed in this matter, urged the necessity of good understanding between France and England was preferable to an intimate alliance. He also believed that the proposed conference would have the effect of settling the question involved, only lead to new complications in Europe.—After some observations from Lord BROUGHTON, the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE CHINA WAR.—On the report of supply for the vote of credit for the China war, Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE, taking advantage of presenting a petition on the ground of its injustice, believing as he did that the opinions of the House and of the country were in favour of the subject being made the matter originally on a question of forcing opinion into China.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in admitting that the question should be brought under discussion, and also the principle that in dealing with Asiatic nations we should be influenced by the fact that they were Asiatics, said that the vote was a correct one completed, ought to have been observed and ratified in the capital of China, and the answer was that the Emperor was the principal party to the war to which we were unhappily engaged.

LATE LEGISLATION.—On the motion for going into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. NEWDEGATE moved that the rule against proceeding with opposed notices and orders after the hour of twelve o'clock be suspended, under the standing order of July 19, 1854, be applied to all business standing for evening sittings upon the paper, and that the standing order of 1854 be observed during the remainder of the Session; his object being to curtail in some degree the extraordinary inconvenience of the House with business placed during the last few weeks.—Sir G. GREY admitted the importance of the question, as well as the evils of the present system; but considered that the motion of the hon. Member by the late lengthy sittings; but he did not think it desirable to enact such a stringent rule as that proposed, especially as there was no analogy between sittings on ordinary days and Wednesdays, when the House rose as a matter of course at six o'clock. It might be well to adopt some modified course which required to be got through after one clock at the option of any member who chose to move that the House do adjourn. It would tend to prevent the obstruction of public business, especially at the end of the Session.—A discussion followed, in which Mr. HENRY BERKELEY and others took part, and in the course of which Mr. DISRAELI suggested that the Government should now confine themselves to what measure they meant to carry this year, and in which opinion Lord ELCHO and others concurred, and that Committees should not be moved for previous to their consideration, and state the result on an early day.—The motion was withdrawn.

THE BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.—The House went into Committee on this measure, and commenced the clause 74, the important part of the sitting was occupied with the consideration of the clauses, the principal discussion taking place on clause 159, which abolishes the distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency, and puts traders and non-traders in the same position in reference to the discharge of debts by bankruptcy and their discharge from their debts.

EXPENSES OF THE WAR WITH CHINA.

In Committee of Ways and Means,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved resolutions for making provision for the vote for China. He said that in February £450,000 was charged on the Estimates for the China War, and a sum of about £1,000,000 amount to the finances of this year, making £2,350,000 for the expedition to China, and before it was finished that sum would probably exceed two millions. It was certainly required was still £2,350,000, although the vote in supply was nominally larger. The vote included £500,000 which had been issued to the bankers, and £400,000 had been expended on the former war. The whole sum required was £5,400,000. The vote in February was £5,000,000, of the first China war was only £3,500,000, to which a sum borne by the East India Company, and in making the cost did not include the loss that the difference between that and the estimate for the present was only £1,200,000. The whole of the £5,000,000 had already been expended but been paid out of the ordinary revenue of last year, of which there was a surplus of £1,000,000; but a portion of that was applied to the reduction of the debt of the country. It was not now proposed to charge the ordinary revenue with more than £500,000 of the charge for the China expedition. The question was how the remaining portion of the charge of £1,200,000 was to be met. There was no reason to doubt the estimated revenue of the year as made in February, but it would be unsafe to calculate on its exact fulfilment. The surplus of £646,000 of the year ending March 31 was estimated in February was subject of. But the calculation of the expense of the collection of the revenue was overstated by £200,000, and the charges on the public debt had been reduced by a sum which left the real surplus £44,000 instead of £646,000; but circumstances connected with the keeping on of the paper duty till the last of August had increased the surplus to £200,000. To this further sum he added the sum which the rejection of the Paper Duty Bill had caused, which he calculated would amount to about £700,000, which would be available. The three sums of £500,000, £200,000, and £700,000, would provide £1,400,000 of the £2,350,000. The sum of £2,350,000, still required, it was proposed to raise it by taxation and in part by other resources. It was proposed to raise £1,350,000 by taxation, and to do so he proposed to make the following addition to the duties—viz., 1s. 11d. a gallon on all spirits, whether under the customs or excise; the duty to be then 10s. 11d. a gallon. British, 1s. to 11s. 1d.; Irish, 1s. 5d. to 11s. 6d. on spirits. It was proposed to provide the remaining £1,350,000 of the £2,350,000 from the Income-tax, which would produce £1,350,000, and the £2,314,000 and they would be better at the end of September. With regard to the vote of credit, the Chancellor stated that it would be only necessary to take from the final decision of the House on the vote now proposed, and he would add that the House would be asked to vote £1,350,000 from the taxation of the country in the present financial year.

The resolutions were then agreed to, in the course of which

Lord PERMOY complained of the Chancellor of the Exchequer availing himself of the vote of credit to meet the China war, which presented a difficulty in the way of settling the question of privilege between the two Houses.

The resolutions were then agreed to; as were resolutions imposing an excise duty of 1s. 11d. per gallon on spirits, and increasing the duties on the value of the malt duty credit; changing the time of payment of the hop duty; imposing a duty of 3s. 4d. on horse-power carriages; and 1s. 6d. on 1861, and 4s. afterwards; imposing stamp duties on contract notes, assignment of leases and mortgages of thirty-five years, on accidental death insurances, and on foreign promissory notes.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

In answer to Lord Brougham, Earl GRANVILLE said it was not in the power of the Government to interfere in the way suggested. A respectable person had been placed in a cabin apart from the other passengers in one of the Cunard steamers, for which he had paid the usual price, and in which a similar case an action had been brought and damages recovered against the owners of the vessel.

The Annuity Tax (Edinburgh Abolition Bill was read a second time, the Lord Advocate explaining that compensation was to be given to the parties who would be affected by the measure.

The Burial Grounds (Scotland) Amendment Bill and the Friendly Societies Act Amendment Bill were read a second time.

The Commissioners for Building New Churches and the Leith Harbour and Docks Bill passed through Committee.

At the request of Lord CRANWORTH, the Committee on the Bleaching and Dyeing Works Bill was postponed.

The House went into Committee on the second reading of the Titles to Land (Scotland) Bill, which was agreed to.

The motion for the House to take called attention to the state of the law of marriage in Scotland, stating that considerable confusion existed in the system at that country, and that a Bill was in preparation on the subject.

In answer to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, Lord WODEHOUSE said that the Government had received no information of the alleged massacre at Jeddah lately. No less than 600 persons had been slaughtered, the Dutch Consul was killed, the American Consul wounded, and all the Consulates except the British had been burnt.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE EDUCATION BILL.—On the motion for the second reading of this bill, Mr. ADDERLEY said he should not oppose the second reading of the bill, but he should not to employed in continuous labour unless they were able to read and write, and that they should attend school for at least 150 days in the year, and not less than six hours in the week. Mr. PEASE moved the rejection of the bill, which was opposed by Mr. C. LEWIS, Mr. C. LAING, Mr. CROSSLEY, and others. After a lengthy discussion, on a division it was lost by 122 to 51.

THE CHINA WAR.—The House went into Committee of this bill was discharged, on the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and the bill was withdrawn, and the following resolutions were reported by the Chairman:—That a matter of conscience not to avail themselves of the grants for education, owing to the existence of religious differences, and that it is the duty of the Government to provide for the teaching of religion in them. He contended, also, that every rule which had been established in 1846 were provided by the Act of Queen Victoria, 26 years ago, withdrew its support from the then system of education in Ireland, which was based on the principle of mixed education. The Government had set up the present system, which by the universal testimony of fact and opinion, had conferred immense benefits upon Ireland. Mr. KENNEDY entered into details, to trace the history of the system, showing how great had been the increase in the number of children receiving education, and, so far from there having been a falling off on the part of scholars from the Established Church, the number of Protestant children had thirty-six per cent more attended than against particular systems, whereas, by the adoption of a single system, a great boon would be conferred upon the country, and would promote the best interests among the whole people in after life.—Mr. Lefroy having spoken, Mr. HENLEY moved that the Committee report progress, which was opposed on the ground that it was not for that Irish members should stand in the way of the Government, and after a discussion, in which Mr. CARDWELL was opposed by Mr. B. Osborne and Lord Palmerston, and on a division it was negatived by 124 to 57. Mr. KENNEDY then moved that the House be now reported the motion.—A division was then taken on the original motion, which was negatived by 124 to 57.

THE LORDS AND THE PAPER DUTY.

Lord PERMOY moved that the rejection by the House of Lords of the Bill for the repeal of the Paper Duty was a breach of the undoubted right and privilege of the House of Commons, and it is therefore incumbent upon the House to adopt such measures as may be necessary to protect its rights and privileges.

Mr. GLADSTONE urged that it was not desirable, after the resolutions which had been come to, again to stir up this important action. The first duty of the Government was to maintain the privileges of the House, and as to the latter part it did not propose any definite plan, but the noble Lord might be assured that the Government would maintain the rights of the House pursued, which he must decline. He moved the previous question.

Sir J. PAKINGTON thought the question was one affecting every one, himself included, for not having taken a more decided course on this question, and he thought that the House was not in a position to express an opinion at the moment than that the precedent should have been made.

Mr. COLVILE said that he should support the amendment for its object; and, though his opinion with regard to the result offered the House by the Lords was not altered, he thought that the House of the people had a right to a say in believing in the financial sagacity of the Lords in retaining the paper duty, and not only that, but in rejecting the measure by which the House was in every sense mischievous, and would result in recording the opinion of a large majority of the people against the policy of the paper duty.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER concurred in the course taken by the Government, and expressed his determination to maintain the rights, the powers, and the privileges of the House of Commons. In any course he had taken in regard to the paper duty, he had done nothing to prejudice the larger question of privilege.

Mr. B. OSBORNE thought that the course which the House, who was in opposed to the repeal of the paper duty, had been placed by the course taken by the House of Lords was a most unlucky one. He wholly opposed to the present resolution.

After a few remarks from Mr. Coningham,

Mr. DISRAELI made some sarcastic remarks on the state of the Liberal party in the House, and said that the Government, as the party in power, had certainly had convinced him that the motion should be directly opposed, and met by a direct negative, and not by the previous question.

Sir G. GREY defended the course taken by the Government.

Mr. HENLEY said that he should support the motion, but that motion was negatived.

On a division Lord Fermoy's motion was lost by 177 to 138.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

In Committee the first 18 clauses of the Highways Bill were passed.

The Common (No. 3) Bill was, after discussion, read a second time, and committed pro forma.

The order for the County Rates Expenditure Bill was discharged.

After some debate and a division on the question of going into Committee, the House went into Committee on the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Bill, and it passed through that stage, though not without some opposition and discussion, and one or two divisions on certain clauses.

The amendments in the Tenure and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Bill were considered and agreed to.

IRISH PROMISSORY NOTES.—In Committee of Ways and Means, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved a resolution relating to supply granted to her Majesty, there shall be charged and paid, for and upon every promissory note made in the United Kingdom for the payment of any sum of money exceeding £5000, now chargeable with the stamp duty of 2d. a fee following rate of stamp duty in lieu of the said duty now chargeable thereon—that is to say, for every £1000, or part of a £1000, of the money thereby made payable, the duty of 10s., which was agreed to.

The Medical Amendment Bill, the Turnpike Trusts Arrangement Bill, the Highways Rates Act Continuance Bill, and the Oxford University Bill, were severally read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Labourers' Cottages (Scotland), Colcwort Barracks (Portsmouth), and Local Government Acts Abolition (Edinburgh and Montrose) Acts, Bills passed through Committee.

The following bills were read a second time—viz., Tramways Orders, Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment, Registration of Burials Act, Cockburn Estate, Lands Clauses Consolidation Act Amendment, Inclosure Comms (Ireland), and Inclosures (No. 2) Bills.

The Criminal Lunatic Asylums, and the Harbour and Docks Bills severally a third time and passed.

THE COUNTY OF KENDAL.—The Earl of DERBY drew attention to the mode in which the business of the House was conducted, and said that though the subject involved was one of very great importance, it nevertheless, of great importance to the country. He remarked that, after six months' sitting, only thirty-four Acts had received the Royal assent, and the House of Commons were waiting for that stage. After commenting upon the mode in which the business had been conducted, he moved that a Select Committee be appointed, moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the subject.—Earl GRANVILLE admitted the inconvenience of the mode in which the business was conducted, but thought that a joint Committee of both Houses would be the better one to consider the matter. He hoped that the noble Earl would take this course especially on account of the recent proceedings of their Lordships.—After some further discussion the motion was withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The morning sitting was wholly occupied by the consideration of the clauses of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill.

WITHDRAWAL OF THE BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

On the House going into Committee upon this Bill,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that finding it impossible to proceed with this bill in the hope of being able to send it up to the House of Lords in such a form as would enable them to consider it this Session, the Government was not only obliged to withdraw it, hoping to be able to reintroduce it early next Session, which he trusted would be successful.—Agreed to.

Sir H. CAIRNS, while cautiously desiring the enactment of such a measure, saw no other course than that of the Government having learned consistent the peculiar circumstances of the case. He suggested that much advantage would be gained if the Attorney-General would consult with the Lord Chancellor, and, by adopting the bankruptcy laws, instead of attempting at the same time to consolidate those laws, they might be able to pass a bill next Session. He regretted, however, that this resolution of the Government had not been announced sooner.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that it had only been arrived at at two o'clock that day.

Mr. MALINS and Mr. HADFIELD severally expressed the opinion that the hon. and learned Gentleman would be doing good service if he would bring it in.

Mr. J. PAKINGTON said that, in consequence of earlier notice not having been given of the intention of the Government in respect to this measure, a great many amendments had been given in the paper which he was sure would be going into Supply (which was the next order on the paper) were now absent, being wholly unprepared for the course taken.

Lord PALMERSTON said that the Government conferred the measure to be one of such great importance that they could not consent to pass it unless they abandon the hope of being able to pass it through Parliament this session.

After a lengthened discussion, in which Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE took part, it was withdrawn.

WITHDRAWAL OF THE LONDON CORPORATION BILL.—Sir G. C. LEWIS announced the intention of the Government to withdraw this bill also for the present Session.

On the order of the day for going into Committee of Supply, Sir C. NAPIER called attention to the state of the Navy, and moved for a select Committee to the effect that the recommendations of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the condition of the Navy ought to be carried out. The gallant Admiral complained of many things affecting the comforts and condition of the seamen of the navy, and urged upon the Government the justice and propriety of taking immediate steps to remove the discontent and dissatisfaction that existed in the service. He also requested that the attention of the Admiralty was given to the sole report alluded to, with the view of carrying out its recommendations as far as they could be carried out, the necessity of applying for an Act of Parliament.—After some discussion the motion was withdrawn.

NAVY ESTIMATES.—The House then went into Committee upon the Navy Estimates, the consideration of which occupied the remainder of the sitting.

MUSIC.

The cheap extra performances at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE still go on. This evening "Oberon" is to be performed for the benefit of Mr. Smith, the lessee, who (as he states) has for this purpose entered into a "treaty" with Madame Lucca, Mdlle. Titiens, and Mario, and by telegraph Signor Mongini, who had departed for Italy. The time is less than the treaty and the artists announced.

At the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA the most favourite operas are repeated, the only novelty being "Rigoletto," which is to be given this evening with Mdlle. Titiens and Signor Mario in the parts of the character of Gilda. The other operas of this week have been the "Huguenots," the "Prophète," and "Orfeo e Euridice."

Mr. Balfe had a second concert on Saturday, at which apparently calls it, "Grand Musical Festival") at the Surrey Gardens' on Wednesday evening. In the absence of last week, the only difference being that the audience were more orderly. At Sims Reeves was again the chief object of attraction. He sang "My pretty Jane," and several other songs, which (though they were received with uproarious enthusiasm. Mr. Balfe's last "Festival" is to be on Wednesday next, when Alboni will be the principal vocalist announced.

There was a good concert at the Hanover-square Rooms on Wednesday evening in aid of the funds of the Middlesex Volunteer Artillery. Mr. Benedict conducted, and the vocalists were Mdlle. Charlotte de Treffenee (a singer of considerable merit, newly arrived in London), Miss Augusta Thomson, Signors Nappi and Dragone, and Mr. Santley. The instrumentalists were Messrs. Lindley, Pratten (an excellent pianist), Messrs. Deichman and Pennard, and M. Douay. They sang and played with great success. Mdlle. Treffenee was warmly applauded by a martial-looking audience, most of the gentlemen being in uniform.

One of the best of the recent concerts has been that of Mr. JOHN THOMAS, the eminent harpist, a gentleman who is not only an accomplished performer on that elegant instrument but a composer of remarkable talent. On the occasion in question, assisted by his own compositions, particularly an arrangement of the famous Welsh melody "Y Deryn Pur" (The Linnet), which he called "Welsh Fancy," and since entitled "Winter," which was exceedingly effective. Mr. Thomas was assisted by Mdlle. Artôt, Miss Augusta Thomson, Mr. John Lefort, Herr Lubeck, Herr Becker, and other distinguished performers.

The annual general meeting of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY was held on Monday last. From the financial statement made by Mr. Anderson, the treasurer, it appeared that the season had been extremely successful—the surplus of receipts above expenditure being nearly £1000. The number of subscribers had been increased by fifty, in addition to their funded property to the amount of £150. The remarkable brilliancy of the performances of the Philharmonic's forty-eighth season has been the subject of general remark. We believe it is in contemplation to mark the society's fiftieth year by a jubilee festival of an interesting character.

THE SATURDAY HALF-HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—The leading firms in the china and glass trade have, we are informed, resolved to close their shops on every Saturday afternoon, and to remain closed.

A HAPPY TOWN.—A Konigsberg letter says:—"The financial position of the town is highly satisfactory. The debt has diminished in the last sitting, not to collect the last third of the communal taxes, amounting to 31,000 thalers.

NATIONAL ORPHAN HOME, HAM-COMMON, RICHMOND.—Viscount Dungarvon presided on Wednesday over the anniversary dinner of this association at the Star and Garter, Richmond. Some 40 present contains nearly 100 orphans, from four to fourteen years of age, and it is a matter of deep regret to the committee that they are compelled, from inadequate accommodation and want of funds, to refuse admission to many urgent applications. Subscriptions, donations, and bequests are much needed. The chairman, who presided in the absence of Earl Cowper, on his wedding-tour, on account of the illness of Mr. Jones, the secretary, and a little on account of the illness of the chairman, in a few appropriate remarks, introduced the object of the meeting to the notice of the company.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Lord Hamilton was returned, without opposition, for Donegal on Tuesday.

The Channel Fleet, consisting of eleven sail of the line, arrived in Bantry Bay on Saturday last.

Sir William Snow Harris, a member of the Royal Western Yacht Club, has been elected an honorary member of the Royal Yacht Squadron.

BRIGHTON ELECTION.—This hard-fought contest terminated on Monday in the election of Mr. James White, the vote for whom and his opponent's being as follows:—White (Liberal), 1568; Rose (Conservative), 1242; Goldsmid (Liberal), who retired from the contest as soon), 648.

A man named Bowtell was tried at the Chelmsford Assizes, on Wednesday, for having uttered a signal on the Eastern Counties Railway whereby the safety of passengers was endangered. The prisoner made no explanation whatever as to his motive for committing the heinous offence. He was found guilty, and sentenced to seven years' penal servitude.

An exhibition of works of art, in connection with the Bradford School of Design, was opened last week in the large room of the Exchange Buildings in that town. It contains about three hundred oil pictures and water-colour drawings. The contributors are chiefly gentlemen residing in the neighbourhood, as well as several in Lancashire.

COMMITTAL OF A SURGEON ON THE CHARGE OF KILLING HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW.—Mr. Dodds, a surgeon, residing at Lewes, has been committed for trial for the manslaughter of his mother. Mrs. Bull was much addicted to sherry, for which her son remonstrated with her on more than one occasion, and, by all talking to its future prospects. There are quarter of a century. Mr. Dodds, with the Leagues, has been in the habit of giving her occasionally a glass of sherry. On Wednesday week Mr. Dodds went to see her about that day. The signs of progress were very cheering, but the society had still a great mission to accomplish.

A FEARLESS PEACE-MAKER.—At the Manchester Police Court on Tuesday a young woman named Mary Tweedale was charged with breaking into the dwelling-house of Mr. Robert Greenhalgh, and with stealing a quantity of wearing apparel. On the morning of the 10th inst. Mr. Moorhouse's premises at Ashton-road were entered during the previous night and a number of coats and articles of children's wearing apparel carried away. The house had been forced by the breaking of the lock of the drawers in the kitchen and parlour had been ransacked. The prisoner was identified as having offered some of the stolen clothing for sale, and was committed for trial at the sessions.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

OPENING OF NEW RAILWAY LINES.—The line from Stockport, which is an extension of the London and South-Western Railway, was opened by the chairman and directors on Wednesday week, with appropriate ceremonies, and was thrown open to public rejoicings. Bands of music paraded the streets; tradesmen closed their shops; and everything was done to make the day a holiday. A similar festive spirit prevailed in the various towns along the line, and Keynsham, Saltford, Bath, Bradford, and Trowbridge were in attendance as a guard of honour. The gallant veteran landed, and proceeded, with Mrs. Gibbs, to the Mayor, Mr. Birmingham, and the Corporation in the chief saloon of which an address was presented to his Lordship in the presence of a distinguished assemblage. His Lordship was accompanied by Major Alison and Colonel Stirling, his Aide-de-Camp, left by the 3.45 train for London, after a most successful visit of joy to his native county, the county of England.

MONUMENT AT MANCHESTER TO JOHN ASHTON NICHOLLS, R.R.A.S.—The scenery of laying the lower course of the obelisk to the memory of the late John Ashton Nicholls, F.R.A.S., was formed on Mons Mercurii, in Ardwick Green, in presence of a large number of spectators, by Mr. Wood, of Ardwick, the erecting classes. The site is situated on the highest eastern and south-eastern slopes. The obelisk will be erected on the middle of Great Ancoats-street, between the openings of Lever-street and Bengal-street. It is stated that the obelisk will be constructed of the Darley Dale stone, in which the deceased gentleman was best known as an employer of Darley labour, and to which he first laboured for upwards of twenty years in connection with Sunday schools, and then as a foremost supporter of the Anoxia Lyceum. The obelisk is to be of polished grey granite, 30 ft. high, and 3 ft. 6 in. square: and it will bear the following inscription:—"Erected by the working men of Manchester in grateful remembrance of the late John Ashton Nicholls, R.R.A.S., who from an early age laboured with untiring zeal and earnestness for the elevation of their class, intellectually, politically, and socially; and by his pure, consistent, useful life, well entitled him to the respect and esteem of all his fellow-citizens. July, 1866." On the pedestal will be the words—"Died September, 1859; aged 56 years."

SERIOUS PARTY RIOTS IN THE NORTH OF IRELAND.—The 12th of July has just gone over without a serious breach of the peace. The papers published on Saturday morning gave accounts from Lurgan, in the county of Armagh, where a collision took place, in which some of the Roman Catholic party were wounded, two, it is feared, mortally. One version of the affray is as follows:—Large parties of those connected with the Orange Society were sympathising therewith, including women and children, entered Lurgan from the country districts, and were accompanied by a number of bands. There were several thousands in all, and they attended Divine service in the parish church, and afterwards separated to return to their respective homes. One of the parties, on arriving at about two miles and a half from Lurgan, was met at a place called Derryadd, by Patrick Murphy, a Roman Catholic, who was armed. The disturbances having continued for some time, some of the Protestant party went to their home in the neighbourhood to procure fire-arms, with which they returned to the spot and fired at the Roman Catholics, sixteen of whom were wounded, and two of them dangerously (one named M'Cann), are not expected to recover. The riot occurred near a Roman Catholic chapel. Ten arrests were made, some on the spot, and others the next day. An investigation was held in Lurgan, before Lord Lurgan, J. Hancock, Esq., and W. M. Brownlow, R.M., when the following evidence was given, but not admitted to bail, and the other three committed for further inquiry. Great excitement and alarm prevailed throughout Lurgan. One version of the Roman Catholics were the aggressors in this unfortunate affair, having assailed the other party with stones, and, when fired upon by the Orangemen, were provoked by one of the Orangemen firing a shot as the cross of the Lurgan Chapel. An inquest on the deceased party was postponed.

TRIALS FOR MURDER.—Hannah Holmes, aged sixteen, was found guilty at Nottingham Assizes, on Wednesday week, of the murder of her master, in whose great she had put some arsenic, of which he died on the 4th of May last. The prisoner's counsel urged that there was no sufficient foundation to merge on the ground of the prisoner's youth. Sentence of death was pronounced.—John Bryan, a navvy employed on the railway works, was tried for throwing her child, aged thirteen months, into an old Roman well at Ipsden, with intent to murder it. The child was found by a boy who was visiting the well out of curiosity, and throwing stones down, which made it cry. He told his father, who went to the well and heard the child cry, and drew it. It appeared that the prisoner had left the place where she was staying with the child, and was met on the other side of Ipsden by a boy, who asked her one person she put it out to nurse, and another that it had died two months before. The jury found her guilty of the charge, but recommended her to mercy on account of the unnatural mother. The child was produced in court, well, full of healthy animation.—At Aylesbury, on Tuesday, a labourer at Winslow, was tried for shooting his wife with intent to murder her. He was charged, first, that he did shoot at her, and, secondly, that he beat till he thought she was dead. The jury found him "Guilty," but one of them recommended him to mercy, observing that he considered the beating in court laughing during the trial. The Lord Chief Justice Kelly passed sentence of penal servitude for life.—The murder has been committed at Barnard Castle. Thomas Dixon, a sawyer, and a woman named Wilson, who lived with him, quarrelled at dinner, and the woman ran away from him to a closet. The man fastened his meal, and then, taking a poker, went deliberately to the closet and beat the woman over the head till she was dead. He then ran away, but was soon secured, and has been committed for trial.—The inquiry into the murder of Mr. Kent's child at Rood, Somersetshire, has been placed in the hands of Inspector Whicher, of the London detective force, and a reward of £100, half of which is furnished by the Government, has been offered for the detection of the murderer. The surmould has been set at liberty, and has returned to Mr. Kent's service.—At the Winchester Assizes on Tuesday, Whitworth, the sergeant of Royal Artillery, who murdered his wife and six children at Southsea, Isle of Wight, was declared to be of unsound mind, and was ordered to be detained as a criminal lunatic.

THE FARM.

The first cycle of the Royal Agricultural Society has ended with but a very poor meeting, so far as receipts went. Kent (which has better shorthorns than she chose to send to the showyard) came off badly in every way, and her Romney Marsh sheep, and her six-and-twenty turn-wrest ploughs, with four horses and two men apiece, caused no little fun for beholders. The round-robin heroes of the Newmarket yard were conspicuous by their absence, and so frightened did they become of their smaller rivals that some of them had actually sent round circulars saying that their agents would send the machines, but, standing on their implements of their own manufacture, took orders as usual. Never was there such a mess as it was in the yard on the Monday when the judges entered it, and the awards made on it by Major Munns at the meeting. Even without them and their specifications, the catalogue was a most valuable one, containing as it did the names of exhibitors of no less than 9345 articles, besides hops and fleeces.

Never at a show has it been that we can remember were the shorthorn awards looked for with such eagerness, and the firsts and seconds were telegraphed, like racing results, from Leeds to London to the Mark Lane Express, whose late lamented editor, Mr. William Shaw, assisted by the Duke of Richmond, the late Lord Berners, and Mr. Thomas Parkinson, of Liverpool. The Devon judging is said to have been so eccentric as regards the dislike of the judges for size that Mr. Leaker, who was put proxy for Mr. Trethewy, withdrew in disgust. The Herefords were allowed on all hands to be very grand, and those who want to dip into them will have to pay dearly for the privilege. Mr. Price's Balmer sells his herd, which numbers some sixty cows and calves, one hundred pure and two hundred and fifty crossed animals, by Mr. Strafford, and roan seemed to be especially served in the shorthorn classes; but we cannot help thinking that judges would often be saved from a great deal of trouble if they were to bracket animals where their merits are so very evenly balanced that it seems mere hyper-criticism to distinguish them. The Scotch were very strong indeed, and adverse criticism might very often be avoided. Among the yearling bulls the thirteen months' old Baron Booth, by the celebrated Baron of Warlaby, and sold at Dublin this spring, came out in improved form, and was not even commended; and the same fate befell Mr. Marjoribanks's Scottish Chief, a bull that was sold to go to the Australian agent for 50 gs. at the Bushey Grove sale on Wednesday. Mr. Meade-king got up to 35 gs. for Commodore, and Mr. Stratton was unfortunate far more than counterbalanced the same week by the loss of his splendid yearling heifer, Star of the Sea, from quarter evil, for which price and 20 gs. more had been refused at Bushey Grove. Although Faith had to resign her winning Warwick honours, she was the only one in the class that was thought worthy of a place in the first row. A good deal of speculation was excited as to what would have been said of Athelstane's place if she had come into the fray. Duchess 76th and Wonder 3rd, which, it is said, are to be taken out, had the unfortunate twins, perhaps, decend on Dauntless, where Mr. Douglas will no doubt stand his ground. Mr. Booth's march his reported to be 1000 miles from Athelstaneford to meet them. For Duchess 67th, the dam of the twins, Captain Gunter gave 500 gs. at Sittyton sale, and for the Duchess 72nd, Mr. Douglas paid 770 gs., 310 gs. more than she was scarcely seven weeks. These Tortworth purchases were the first he ever made, Mr. Elliot, M.P., and Mr. Allen, M.P., being the only members of Shropshire Downs—a fine stimulus for the class in its maiden year. Mr. Jonas Webb's three pens of sheep all got into the prize-list, and, as was to be expected, he was named Man of Kent; the second, from his very lofty style, Park Ranger; and the third, Archbishop—a name suggested, we believe, by Colonel Challoner, the chairman of the American prairie. Of the winning rams the first, which was bought by Mr. Stanley last year for 60 gs., and the third, which was shown at Warwick and not even commended, for 70 gs. The Duke of Richmond had the second ram, which he sold at Canterbury. It has, we dir, been arranged between Mr. Webb and his customers that if they are not satisfied with the awards in the two shows classes at Leeds next July he will retire pro tem. from the lists. At Mr. Pawlett's sale of Leicesters 85 rams averaged £4 19s., and 30 Hampshire downs 10 gs. more, and among the latter Mr. Druce's Beginner's sire got 120 gs. Mr. Rigden's and another pen by Mr. Brownlow's Bromsborough, and Colonel Duncombe's, and a bull with several crosses of Booth blood. Sixty-three rams were let at Holmespierpont on Tuesday, at an average of £5 2s. 3d., the highest price being 20 guineas for a stances of the season. Mr. Stanley retains the first-prize Canterbury shearling ram, Mr. Druce has purchased the second-prize shearling by W.K. dam by M U, goes to Mr. Thunder, of the country of Meath, for 11 gs.; the third-prize shearling to Mr. Owen, of Bissington, Ireland, for 15 gs.; the fourth-prize shearling to Mr. Meade, of the county of Cork, for 8½ gs.; and the first-prize ram, a four-shear, by M U, dam by Mr. Jonas Webb's Man of Kent, to Mr. Sutton, Lincolnshire.

The agricultural meetings come very thick next week. The North Lincolnshire will be held at Horncastle on Wednesday and Thursday; the Durham County at Bishop Auckland, and the Ryedale and Pickering Farmers' Association at Pickering; and the Kent and East Riding at Great Driffield on Friday. The Royal Irish is fixed for Wednesday week, and the Highland for the 1st. In the absence of Mr. Douglas, the lots will have fewer strangers than usual amongst them.

A numerous meeting took place on Tuesday respecting the proposed removal of the Corn Exchange from its present inconvenient position to Mincing-lane. The Crystal Palace, the Copenhagen Cattle Market, and the People's Palace, Mile-end, were visited, and all endeavoured to show that they had more eligible sites to offer; but Mr. Sidney elucidated the matter by moving a resolution to the effect that the committee should conclude the agreement with the new Agricultural (Limited) Hall Company of Dixon's Lain, and nominate a committee of 21 to carry out the matter, signing a lease for twenty-one years on behalf of the club. Sir Andrew Lusk and others spoke in opposition to the scheme, in effect that the proceedings should be postponed till the annual meeting of the Club, but were beaten on a division by 39 to 10. This new site is said to be close to the Corn Exchange, and commands a glorious explosion.

HAMBURG.—In a sitting of the Community of Citizens on Tuesday the proposition for the removal of the Senate and the citizens already known, was adopted by 116 against 28.

A MODERN ASTROLOGER.—A man who has lately set up as a fortune-teller in Liverpool has issued a circular, from some he professes to plain clothes. Ignorance of the trap, the astrologer drew the policeman's horoscope, and, to the latter's astonishment, foretold several events in his career, that the inquirer would meet with a railway accident and go altogether 1863, which he was not to have; he was to return to England in 1866, when he would succeed to a fortune. The policeman pronounced his real character, and the séance was concluded; the policeman announced his real character, and the astrologer was summoned for obtaining money.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.—A return was published on Thursday morning of all cases in which corporal punishment has been inflicted in gaols during the last three years. The number has been as follows:—Bedford, 2; Berks, 5; Bucks, 2; Cambridge, 11; Chester, 48; Cornwall, 19; Derby, 5; Devon, 41; Dorset, 3; Durham, 41; Essex, 4; Gloucester, 45; Hereford, 1; Hertford, 38; Kent, 90; Lancaster, 150; Leicester, 18; Lincoln, 18; Middlesex, 51; Norfolk, 10; Northampton, 3; Northumberland, 39; Nottingham, 4; Oxford, 14; Salop, 22; Somerset, 28; Southampton, 2; Stafford, 78; Suffolk, 6; Surrey, 7; Sussex, 11; Warwick, 4; Westmoreland, 1; Wilts, 6; Worcester, 5; York, 13. The only returns from Wales are 10 cases at Denbigh. In the county prison of Dorset 73 lashes were inflicted on one prisoner and 60 on another. Forty-eight ladies were inflicted on a man 66 years of age.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE official contradiction of the deaths of Sweetmeat and Knight of Kars, and the announcement of Caller Ou, one of the handsomest horses and the sire of some of the finest hunting stock of the day, are among the principal items of turf news. Mr. Fisher has also purchased Drake, a son of Lanercost, and has been out along with Gladiateur and Juliet, &c., to Australia. It is said that the foals will not accompany the mares on the voyage, and that a few very handsome prices have already been offered for one of them. Courtenay and Royal Ravenhill, the property of the late Mr. Thomas Ferguson, will be sold at Harker Lodge, near Carlisle, next Thursday, along with twenty-eight hay and brown colts and fillies by the latter from Cleveland mares, one of which, Lady Ann, by Ion, with foals at foot. Mr. Ferguson was long known as one of the most extensive and successful breeders of coach-horses in the north of England, and Cleveland Wigginthorpe, Phœnix, and Galaor were all in his stud by turns. Royal Ravenhill won the Royal Society's prize at Carlisle in 1855, beating, inter alia, Lord Derby's Cleveland Bridge.

Mr. Rorey is following in the track of the great agricultural shows during the present week. He has been at Canterbury and Bishop's Castle, and after trying his hand on everything in the shape of sheep and bulls, he is at present on a trip to the Highland and Leeds, and a look at the yearlings at the Bushey Grove Durham County Show, and we believe that he commences with his second military class early in August.

Goodwood Meeting opens on Tuesday next. The Ham and Grafenstein Stakes have a large entry, numbering 31, including Lord Patrick (3 lb.) and Folkestone in the one, and Cape Flyaway and Sagitta in the other; while Wallace (6 lb. ex.) has a half-mile race in the Lavant, in which Lord Clifden and Sir Bevys, as St. Albans will most likely be kept for Doncaster, Rattlebone, Scrutineer, and perhaps Buccaneer, will contest the Drawing-room Stakes. Of the "ins days" of the former, along with Thunderbolt and Northern Light, are the leading entries to the miniature Cup. Dundee, Dunlop, Sophiatus, Parasite, Lisbeth, and Wallace, are in the Molecomb; Knight of St. Patrick, Longshot, Dundee, Folkstone, Copernicus, Brown Bess, and Wallace in the Stewards' Cup; Lord Clifden, Express likely to frighten everything out of the Four-year-old Nutbrook Stakes, Trovatore, Sir Bevys, Rattlebone, Scrutineer, and The Wizard (who won it last year) are in the Three-year-old; and Big Ben and Brother to Teddington in the Two-year-old race of that title. Butterfly (2st. 5lb.), Sir Bevys, and Wallace (6 lb. ex.) are entered to Satellite (8st.) for the Cup, which is not likely to bring out a very large field; and Lord Clifden, Sir Bevys, and Trovatore are the Contadina among its fourteen.

The aquatic fixtures are as follows:—On Monday, the Lambeth Watermen's, Putney and Rochampton, and the "Christchurch, Lambeth, and Old Bargh House" regattas; the Milford Haven Regatta and the Wedderburn Club on Tuesday; and the Royal Thames and Club Regatta, at Dunoon, for Saturday.

The hollow manner in which Mr. Payne's crew have beaten the Gentlemen, who had to contend, at some disadvantage in consequence of the disabled state of Mr. V. E. Walker's right hand, has been the topic of much conversation in the Metropolis during the week. The figures for the loss of twenty-two wickets only ran up the marvellous number of 1222 runs, which is the largest number ever recorded. The bowling of Jackson in the second innings was very fine, and he took Mr. Waud's and Mr. Makinson's wickets in two successive balls. At Lord's on Monday the Eleven of Harrow School will play against the Gentlemen of the M. C. C. and Ground next the suburban clubs. On Monday the Gentlemen of Kent will play Cambridge, and Surrey makes a return match as Chelmsford, and on Thursday Nottingham v. Surrey (return) at Trentbridge, and Kent v. Sussex (return) at Tonbridge Wells, are issues to be "well and truly tried."

CRICKET.—ETON v. HARROW: Lord's Ground, on Friday and Saturday last. The annual contest between the elevens of Eton and Harrow and Eton met in contest. About six thousand visitors, principally composed of the old boys of the rival schools, were present on the ground, forming a ring around it, three, and in some instances four, deep. This eagerly-looked-for match commenced at 11 o'clock on the first day, and on Saturday night Eton had 38 runs to get, and two wickets to go down. The score was as follows:—Harrow, first innings, 84; second innings, 96. Eton, first innings, 58; second innings, 221.

M. C. C. and Ground v. Eleven Colts: This match was brought to a conclusion on Wednesday at Lord's; the Colts winning by seventeen runs. The following is the score:—M. C. C. and Ground, first innings, 109; second, 75. Eleven Colts, first innings, 168; second innings, 117.

Surrey v. Kent: This match was concluded on Wednesday at Brighton, the Surrey proving victorious in one innings. Score:—Surrey, 284. Sussex, first innings, 144; second innings, 140.

The Gentlemen of the North of England v. the Gentlemen of the South: This match was brought to a conclusion on the Oval early on Saturday, the Gentlemen of the South winning by eight wickets. Score:—North, first innings, 91; second innings, 238. South, first innings, 384; second innings, 46.

All England Eleven v. Twenty-Two of Gainsborough: This was a three days' match, commencing on Monday, and terminating on Wednesday last Saturday, when The Eleven were victorious by forty-nine runs. The score was as follows:—All England Eleven, first innings, 119; second innings, 94. Gainsborough, first innings, 133; second innings, 91.

A meeting of the City Bank took place on Tuesday, when the report, announcing a dividend and bonus of 4½ per cent, making a total distribution for the year ending in June of 7½ per cent, free of income tax, was adopted.

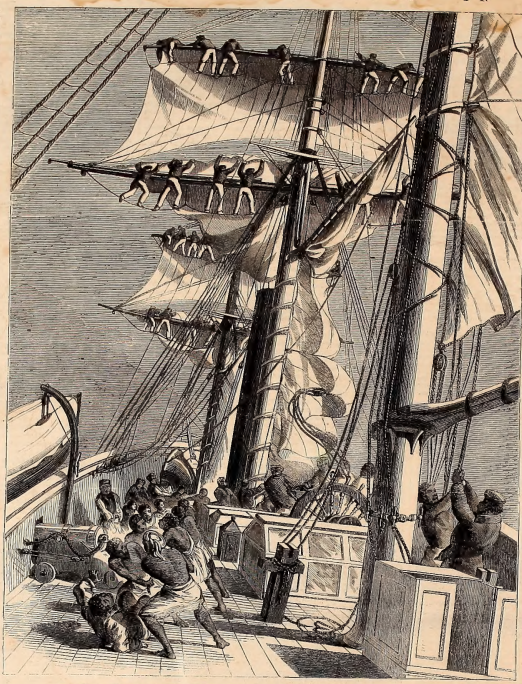
The roses on each side of the grand promenade in Kew Gardens are now in flower; the orange and lemon trees are also in blossom; the lawn is in most beautiful condition; and an avenue of roses in that part of the garden behind the Old Museum is a sight highly attractive to visitors.

At the Ratcliff Gasworks, near the Thames Tunnel, on Tuesday, while a new telescopic gasholder was being lowered into its tank prepared to receive it the chains broke, and the gasholder was fell to the ground. One man was killed, and several others were seriously injured.

THE LIVINGSTONE EXPEDITION IN AFRICA.

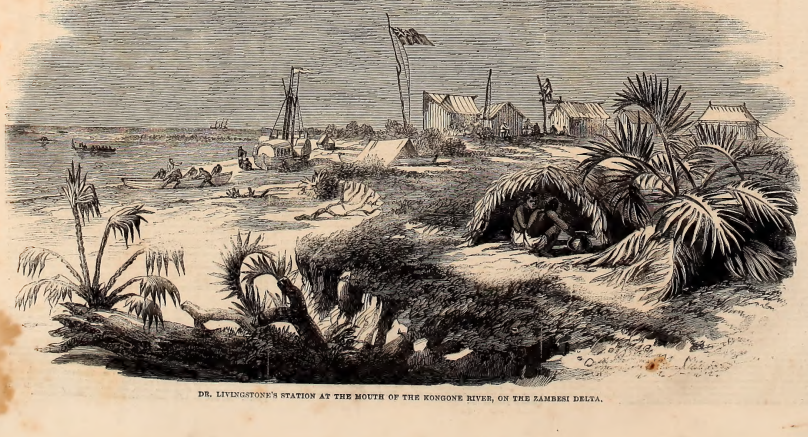
THE Zambesi, or Sechoke, a river of Central Africa, rising in the marshes of the interior, is the main stream of a vast system explored by Livingstone in 1856, and has a winding course from the west. In latitude 17 deg. 57 min. south, long. 26 deg. 6 min. east, it bends to the south, and forms a magnificent cascade. On the north it is joined by the Kafoe, its chief affluent; it then turns east, and flows to the Mozambique Channel, forming a delta 100 miles in length. It is on this delta, at the mouth of the River Kongone, that Dr. Livingstone's station, represented in one of the accompanying Engravings, is situated. Her Majesty's sloop of war Lyra, Lieut.-Commandant H. Berkeley, which had been sent from the Cape by Admiral Sir Frederick Grey for the relief of Dr. Livingstone's expedition, is in the offing, and her boats are pulling in over the bar. The first Engraving represents the Lyra taking in sail during a squall, with slaves on her deck captured in an Arab dhow on the east coast of Africa. Both the Illustrations are from sketches by T. Baines, Esq., artist to the Livingstone expedition.

THE PROVINCE OF PECHILI, CHINA.



By the latest intelligence from China we learn that the French and English expeditionary force is on the move northwards. The number of the Overland China Mail dated Hong-Kong, May 23, in its summary of news contains the following particulars relating to the expedition:—"Sir Hope Grant still remains in Hong-Kong, but preparations are making for his departure northward on the 30th of this month. General Sir Robert Napier has already left. While we write a considerable portion of the force is on the move northwards in transports, which were to rendezvous at Tuitum Bay, on the other side of this island, whence, after they were collected, and a fair wind arose, they were to sail northward under the convoy of H.M.S. Sawaun. The troops thus starting are Bedingfield's battery, Pennycuik's battery, the 2nd battalion of the 60th Rifles, the 3rd Buffs, the 2nd battalion of the 1st Royals, the 1st battalion of the 99st Regiment, the 44th Regiment, with the 8th and 19th Punjaub Infantry. Their destination, we think, is Chusan, for the present. The troops armed with rifles carry in their pouches 40 rounds of ordinary ammunition, and 16 of metallic cartridges. The latter are waterproof, and would be serviceable in the mud of the Peiho; but, doubtless, no such affair as that of last year will be repeated now. Each vessel also carries a reserve of ammunition sufficient to supply 200 rounds for infantry and 100 for artillery and engineers. The French force is reported to be about to rendezvous at Che-foo, on the coast of Shan-tung and in the Gulf of Pechili; and there will be also a station for British stores and troops on the opposite side of the Gulf. Hope Grant may perhaps occupy Ten-Tsin before he attempts to take the Taku forts. A confidential Correspondent, in a position to obtain good information, writes to us:—"The reports I get from Pekin are to the effect that the defences of the Taku forts are very substantial, and that the Chinese have been practising in gunnery till they fire indeed on more than one occasion whilst living upon it in boats (as Mr. Court, the Master, and I did for a fortnight) we often found that a stiff breeze off shore reduced the water to only a foot in depth. The with great precision.' This is borne out by a visit of H.M.S. Forbin to the Gulf of Pechili, which has reported that an extensive line of fortifications has been erected on the banks of the Peiho from its mouth upwards. It also appears from the Pekin Gazette that trenches or rifle-pits are to be used by the Chinese, and from their own invention. The expedition is not without its artists, for it is to be accompanied by Mr. Wingman, of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, whose truthful and clever sketches of the Chinese are already so well known; and by Signor Beato, the photographer, who has taken so many scenes in the Crimea and in India."

Such being the state of things in the north of China, the present is an opportune period for giving the accompanying Map of that portion of China where there is every likelihood of a death-struggle taking place. Chili, or Pechili, is the most northern province of China, having on its north Mongolia, on its east the Gulf of Pechili, and on the other sides the provinces Shan-tung, Shan-se, and Ho-nan. It is about as large as England and Wales, and its population has been estimated at about thirty millions. Though well watered, it is the least productive province of China Proper; and it owes its importance to containing the capital, Pekin, and the great depôts of rice and salt for the internal supply of the empire, and of the cattle sent into China from Mongolia.



Of the Peiho River, and of the city of Tien-Tsin, on its banks, we gather the following particulars from a valuable paper by Captain Sherard Osborn, read before the Royal Geographical Society:—

"The Peiho, which, being translated, means 'the North River,' has its sources in the high lands at no great distance beyond Pekin, and runs for the major portion of its tortuous course through a level country, the velocity of its stream, rather than the volume of its water, having scoured out a narrow bed in the stiff clay which forms the substratum of the plain of Chili. This scouring force, however, becomes so weakened as it approaches the sea, owing to the low level of the shores allowing a constant overflow, that, instead of cutting a twelve-foot channel straight out into the Gulf of Pechili, the depth of the river suddenly decreases, and the river discharges itself over an area several miles in extent, forming what is known as the Bar.

"The bar of the Peiho River, measured on the seaward side, extends in a great curve of six miles in length, and at its narrowest point between the deep water within and without it is two miles wide. It consists of very stiff clay, with a few patches of shingle here and there; the whole of which overlaid by nine or ten inches of earthy deposit from the river. At low-water spring tides we only found two feet of water upon the bar in the deepest places; and deepest water observed in calm weather, when accidental circumstances could be relied upon, showed a depth of rather more than eleven feet. It is, however, possible that in the Gulf of Pechili, as in other shallow, landlocked seas, these data are to some degree dependent upon the season of the year; and that winds of a certain force or from certain directions may at other seasons retard or hasten the time of high water, and affect the height of water upon the bar to the extent of a foot or eighteen inches.

"There is no continuous surf upon the bar, but when it blows a fresh breeze from the south-east there is quite enough sea on to render the bar highly dangerous for open boats, and the vessels now native here usually remain in this neighbourhood are decked. The force of the draft used in this neighbourhood at the height of the spring tide by the current of the Peiho River at its mouth is three to two-and-a-half knots per hour. During the first three hours of the flood and the last three of the ebb tide the current sets directly in and out of the river; but, whilst the tide is high enough to cover the mud flats, the direction of the current follows that of the river's course.

"Directly the bar is crossed a deep channel is entered, which, although tortuous, has never less than twelve feet of water in it, and in many places much more, all the way from the entrance to Tien-Tsin. It would be difficult to account for the sharp bends in this river or its generally tortuous course, except by that it has formed itself in a soft alluvial soil, which has had apparently only to cut its way through stiff as a table, and which, therefore, has not had to contend with the rules blue or yellow clay; nevertheless, in the vicinity of Tien-Tsin and Taku, at its mouth, which intervene between the city of Tien-Tsin and Taku, at its mouth, the river turns and twists over not less than fifty miles of ground, very much as the lead down in the chart accompanying the account of Lord Macartney's Embassy to Pekin in 1793.

"The banks of the river were turned to every possible advantage by a swarming population. Mud-built villages commence within a mile of the entrance: the largest of them, Taku, has now become well known as a scene of hostilities—a mere collection of hovels, its unfortunate but strong-smelling inhabitants will long have occasion to remember it. Unwatched, dirty, and unkempt children, in numbers, appear to the eye of a European, they are, in fact, exceedingly rich with the hoarded fruits of commercial and agricultural industry; and the plunder carried off by the allies on the forts, which looked about as wretched as Worthing does in the month of January, could not have been found by the most experienced dealer in old iron to amount to smaller than one of our large cities.

"Beyond the first fifteen miles the Peiho improves rapidly; the soil of everything of any stature increases in depth and fertility; signs of agriculture increase on either hands fields; of Indian corn, millet, beans, and cotton, succeed each other in quick succession. Beyond this belt of cultivation and its teeming population a dreary steppe was seen extending, on which trees were scarce and houses few and far between.

"A reach, three miles long in a straight line, brought us in sight of the city of Tien-Tsin, and the tall-looking pagodas which stand by the city is famous commerce at the end of this reach, near the remains of an old ruined tower which once guarded this approach.

"Tien-Tsin consists of a small walled city in the form of a square, each face as nearly as possible a mile long: and each facing to the four cardinal points of the compass. It is surrounded by a wall of time-worn walls a single gate opens out, giving only four outlets, a pretty good proof that it is not a very large place, and has not a very numerous population. It stands at the point of land at the north bank of the Great Canal and the River Peiho, but its walls are from two to three hundred yards from the water's edge. The space at present extent lie to the north, and west, and east; but on the plain, facing the southern wall, few, if any, houses are seen. These suburbs consist for the most part of one story mud-built houses, and are generally ruinous: they were excessively ill-kept, and, of all the strong-smelling places it has been my hard fate to visit in this land of strong and foul smells, Tien-Tsin and suburbs—Settlement, houses, and Concessions—is the most disagreeable.

"The country above Tien-Tsin varied in no degree from that immediately below it. A splendid paved road exists between Tien-Tsin and Pekin, and in dry weather the whole plain is passable for carriages, men, or horses. If, as many assert, the Emperor ever again opens Pekin be necessary, the months of April, May, and June would be the best to visit it. The course of the Peiho and Great Canal affords a safe show for facilities of transport, supplies, manual labour, and fresh water; depôts should be there established, and the fall of Pekin would be secured with no great difficulty."

Of Pekin itself—the goal, if not the prize, in views—we shall have ample opportunity to treat hereafter, when we give an Engraving, which is in hand, of the Imperial city.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

General Sir D. Leighton, K.C.B.: The will and codicil of General Sir David Leighton, of Bulford House, Charlton Kings, Gloucester, were proved in the principal registry of the Court of Probate on the 19th inst., by Lady Leighton, his relict, Edmund Thomas Leighton, Esq., the son, and Claudius Buchanan Kerr, M.D., the acting executors. The testator died on the 1st of last month, and was sworn under £45,000. Sir David has bequeathed to his relict, in addition to her jointure of £1,000 per annum under the settlement, the life interest in a further sum of £20,000, and an immediate legacy of £500, and leaves her the plate, linen, china, and household furniture, and the residence of Bulford House, which at her decease he has bequeathed to his eldest son, David. He bequeaths to his younger son, Edmund, the estates at Kemble-town, and he bequeaths the residue of his property equally amongst his children.

Lady George Beresford: Letters of administration, with the will and codicil annexed, of the late Lady George Beresford, of Curraghmore, county Waterford, relict of the late Lord George Thomas Beresford, G.C.H., son of the Most Rev. Marcus, Archbishop of Waterford, were granted in the Court of Probate to her daughter, Elizabeth Harriet Georgiana Isles, the wife of Henry Bein, Esq., executrix of the said will—Mr. Henry Bein, Mr. Edward Lawford, Mr. Edward Lawford, Esq.—renounced probate of the will. Her Ladyship has bequeathed to her three daughters specific portions of diamonds, and further leaves to them as follows:—To Elizabeth, her books; to Harriet De la Poer Beresford, her pictures; and to Caroline Ida Emily, her plate. In the event of there not being sufficient to satisfy the pecuniary legacies, they are to divide amongst them the remainder of her diamonds and jewellery, and the residue of her personal estate is to be equally divided between them and sister. To her servants she bequeaths as follows:—To Elizabeth Isles, who has been with her many years, she leaves an annuity of £50; to Mary Shaw, an annuity of £10; and to each of them she leaves £10 for mourning, as well as a year's wages in addition.

Sir W. Denville, Bart.: The will and codicil of Sir William Denville, Bart., of Richfield Lodge, Berkshire, baronet, who died on the 15th of May last, in the 82nd year of his age, were proved in London by his son, Sir James Graham Denville, Bart., the sole executor. The personal estate, which is sworn under £12,000, is bequeathed to his wife all his furniture, plate, china, his Royal Exchange Stock, his Bank Stock, and an immediate sum of £200. The testator also bequeaths to his younger son and daughters, and to his eldest son he leaves his residuary estate and the residue of his personal estate. The will and codicil were made in 1868. Sir William was the author of a work entitled "The Baltiads," the copyright of which he has lately sold to Mr. Bentley. Sir William was the son of the first Baronet, who owed his elevation to his being Lord Mayor of London during the memorable visit of the allied sovereigns to this country at the conclusion of the general peace in 1814, when he had the honour of entertaining at the Guildhall the Prince Regent of England, with the above-named heads, on that occasion in the City.

The Hero, with the Prince of Wales on board, was passed on the 11th, in longitude 9.30 west. All well.

In consequence of the scarcity of factory-workers in Rossendale arrangements are in progress to introduce into the district a considerable number of silk weavers from Spitalfields.

In a letter to the Times Dr. Cortis, of Filey, states that the fund raised for the fishermen whose boats were wrecked during the late storm will make good about one-half of the property lost by the poor fellows.

The total number of convicts sent out to the penal settlements in the ten years ending with 1859 was 3563, at a total expenditure of £457,873, or about £129 each convict.

The guarantee fund subscribed for the International Exhibition of 1862 amounts to £318,000. It is understood that the Royal Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 are willing to grant the use of that part of their estate at South Kensington for the exhibition, and that a portion of the buildings to be erected will be permanent, available for future exhibitions of art and industry.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer having intimated that the expenses of the China war will be met out of the surplus revenue, the Bank rate of discount and the surplus revenue of the country, must home stocks have shown an increase, and the Government Funds have maintained the position we did such. An better from St. Petersburg states that the Emperor has issued a ukase giving heavy penalties on the importation of foreign goods in the Russian dominions, in fact, upon the same footing as native subjects. This measure is regarded in the money market as hostile.

Several half-yearly meetings of Joint-stock Bank proprietors have been held this week, and the dividends declared are on the whole generally considered very favourable. The dividend of the Commercial Bank of London is at the rate of 14½ per cent per annum. The City Bank (Limited) announces that the London and Westminster, including bonus, 20; London Joint-stock, 12½; and the London Chartered Bank of Australia, 10 per cent per annum on the paid-up amount, all free of income tax. The St. Katharine Dock Company have declared a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent for the year.

We understand that a further call of £100 per share will be made on the shareholders of the Imperial Ottoman Bank in November next, which will be the greatest great disarray in several quarters.

The rise has been considerable of late for money on most parts of the Continent, and the rates have tended upwards. At Paris the lowest quotation is now 3½; at Frankfort, 4; at Berlin, 5; at Amsterdam, 3½; at Hamburg, 4; at Vienna, 5; at Trieste, 5½; at Madrid, 6; at Cadiz, 7; at Barcelona, 8; at Oporto, 7; at Genoa, 6; at Turin, 6; at Florence, 6; at Rome, 6; at Naples, 6; at Leghorn, 6; at Venice, 6; at Milan, 6; at Palermo, 6; at Malta, 6; at Gibraltar, 6; at Alexandria, 6; at Constantinople, 6; at Bombay, 6; at Calcutta, 6; at Madras, 6; at Sydney, 6; at Melbourne, 6; at Adelaide, 6; at Hobart Town, 6; at Launceston, 6; at Auckland, 6; at Wellington, 6; at Nelson, 6; at Dunedin, 6; at Christchurch, 6; at Wanganui, 6; at Taranaki, 6; at Napier

THE ARRIVAL OF THE "GREAT EASTERN" AT NEW YORK.—FROM A SKETCH TAKEN ON THE JERSEY SIDE BY E. HALL.

THE "GREAT EASTERN" AT NEW YORK.

THE arrival of the Great Eastern in New York has been already described in this Journal, but the following graphic sketch by the special correspondent of the Times will be read with interest:—"The Spit at Sandy Hook was crowded with visitors, who stood bareheaded in the fierce sun as they cheered and waved their hats to the ship. The bell at the lighthouse was clanging madly in honour of the occasion, and signal-flags of every hue and colour were drooping in the sun, though still giving an air of festivity and animation even to the arid spot over which they were expected to flutter. As the harbour opened out it could be seen covered with a perfect fleet of yachts, which now, favoured with a slight breeze, were skimming across the still water from all directions towards us, their flags waving, their crews cheering and shouting a welcome till they were hoarse again. Great ferry-boats and coasting steamers, looking for all the world like a street of houses floating out to sea, with their three tiers of windows and regular cotton roofs, came rolling slowly down—decks, roofs, and windows all crowded with eager heads, the ladies waving handkerchiefs and clapping hands—the men shouting and cheering—all seeming wild with exultation and delight. Past the shores of Staten Island and on to the Narrows the Great Eastern continued her stately way, every minute increasing the excitement and adding scores to the numbers of yachts, pleasure-boats and steamers swarming round. In vain the band of the Great Eastern played 'Hail, Columbia!' in vain the bands of the other steamers essayed 'Rule Britannia;' music was drowned and shouted down with cheers. The 'universal ha!' went into the air—the 'universal handkerchief' was waved, and the Americans, always 'guessing,' guessed for this time truly when they said no such ovation had ever been paid to any vessel in the world. It was a heart-stirring welcome, and one which, even now that it is past and done, one cannot recall without a feeling of emotion and astonishment. The departure of the vessel from the Thames, the departure of the Queen from Cherbourg, even the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race (the last a wonderful specimen of aquatic excitement), give no idea of the reception of the Great Eastern at New York. Every minute brought down fresh steamers, each seeming more crowded and more enthusiastic than the others, and every minute added to the thousands who lined the shores and stood bareheaded, cheering under an almost tropical sun. Off Fort Hamilton the high compliment of a salute of fourteen guns was given, the first time that ever a merchant-vessel has been saluted in America. To this distinguished honour the Great Eastern responded by stopping, and, dipping her ensign, replied gun for gun in a regular and seamanlike style. A Government vessel, the chief revenue-ship, next saluted and dipped her flag, and this honour was similarly acknowledged. From this time out it was almost one continued roar of artillery, ringing bells, blowing steam-whistles, shouting and clapping hands, till one was almost dizzy with the whirl and wild confusion of uproar and excitement. As she came through the Narrows, New York could be seen dimly through the smoke and hot haze, red, dry, and baked-looking in the summer sun, with the shore lined with thousands and tens of thousands of people, and the water so covered with boats of every size and shape that it seemed a mystery how ever the Great Eastern was to get through them all. This difficulty, however, was solved by the simplest of all methods—viz., that the Great Eastern kept her course and everything else took good care to keep out of her way. As New York loomed nearer and nearer the jangle of joy-bells could be heard from the steeples. What had seemed at a distance but a dark line along the shore grew more and more distinct, and showed at last to be dense masses of human beings shouting and waving hats as if they were possessed. Not only, too, were the shores thus lined, but even the roofs of the stores and houses far and near, the rich green hills on the opposite bank, the very masts and yards of all the vessels in the harbour seemed literally black with countless swarms."

THE ENGLISH FLEET IN CHINA, OFF KINTANG.

KINTANG, or Silver Island, off which the fleet under Admiral Jones, C.B., assembled prior to the occupation of Chusan, is one of a group of islands near the east coast of China. The fleet was composed of the Impérieuse, flag-ship, 51 guns; Scout, 21; Pearl, 21; Roebuck, dispatch gun-boat; Firm, Opossum, gun-boats; Duchayla, French frigate; l'Alarme and l'Avalanche, French gun-boats; the Grenada, having on board General Sir Hope Grant and Staff, and the transports Adventure,

THE FLEET IN CHINA UNDER ADMIRAL JONES ASSEMBLED OFF KINTANG PRIOR TO THE OCCUPATION OF CHUSAN.

Tasmania, Gamecock, and Walmer Castle. Kintang and its neighbouring islands are very fertile, and in a high state of cultivation. The hills are covered with bamboo plantations and dwarf fir, among which the red azalea and other beautiful wild flowers luxuriate. The inhabitants are of a peaceable disposition. They came off and traded with the produce of their farms as though our forces were there as friends rather than enemies. It is a novel species of warfare when in one part of the country the inhabitants trade with, and in other instances apply for protection to, the people on whose heads in another part a price of 200 dollars is set—as the Mandarins of Shanghai applied to Mr. Bruce for protection from the rebels the other day.

A correspondent of the Times writes from Chusan on April 29 as follows:—"You will have learnt long before this letter reaches you that on the 20th of March the Adventure, gunboat, Commander Hall, the Walmer Castle, and the Sonson, with the Octavia and Mars in tow, left Hong-Kong. Kintang was the rendezvous for our transports and ships of war. The island lies between the west end of Chusan and the Ningpo River, and possesses only one good and small harbour—namely, Port Loo-sotee, which affords anchorage in from seven to ten fathoms. The voyage from Victoria to the 'Silver Island' is generally monotonous. The coast-line is mountainous, rocky, and sufficiently monotonous. The coast-line is mountainous, rocky, and dreary. The Ladrone, Botoltobago, Formosa, Video, and Fisherman's Group rise up like cases in the desert waste of waters. As we crawled along towards the weather grew colder, and on the 17th thermometer fell as low as 84 deg. On the morning of the 23rd of April we dropped anchor in a fog of peasouphic misery among the islands about Kintang. Fog-horn, bell, bugle, and the sharp report of a 9-pounder rang out at intervals, making melancholy music in the ears of those who were within gun-shot. Our guns met, at last, with a response, and we knew, from the salute of four guns and the sound of the bell, that there was a war steamship somewhere at hand. As the fog cleared off a little we saw the Walmer Castle standing outside the channel, and within half a mile of us lay at anchor the insignificant barque Creesy, of Sunderland, containing part of the 67th Regiment, and that fine, black, wicked-looking screw-corvette the Pearl now flew past—one of those dare-devil Peninsular and Oriental mail-steamers, we think, I suppose, for Shanghai. One would have thought that she was ploughing, on the second day, the waters of the silent deep on the Thames. The island of Kintang never looked more beautiful. All the lower ranges of its irregular hills, looking like a succession of gigantic molehills, and covered with tea-plantations, shone out so green that one's eyes rejoiced in the brightness of the colour. The small villages, with their neatly-thatched roofs embowered in trees, the columns of staring red brick, half hidden in the grey wreaths of smoke curling along the valley; the fresh and fragrant breeze blowing off the land, the blithe song of the song-birds, even the very chattering magpies, and joyous, creak of the halliard, revived home memories hardly less painful than pleasant to the hard-sick exile."

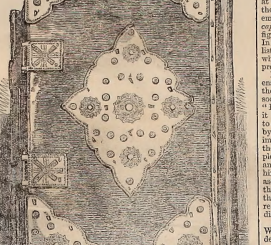
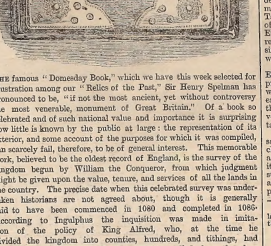
SCIENTIFIC NEWS.



BRITISH ASSOCIATION.—Abstracts of the more important papers read at the recent meeting at Oxford were given in our last number, but some we shall give short notes. We hope that several will form the bases of experiments for future investigation, and thus add to the transactions of the Institution. We are glad to learn that Professor Phillips is authorised to prepare a detailed index to the Transactions of the Association from 1831 to 1860 inclusive.

VEGETABLE ACIDS.—Mr. Plummer, an American chemist, has discovered the acid in the peas of the yellow field pea. Mr. Lancaster, his countryman, has found malic acid in the juice of the quince, and oxalic acid in the stalks of the rhubarb, as well as in sorrel. Mr. Kay some time ago recognised citric acid in several English rhubarbs, and also sufficient quantity of malic acid in them, to lead to its consideration as their extensive cultivation as a source of produce for commercial purposes.

THE ATMOSPHERIC WASHING-MACHINE, invented by Mr. J. Fisher, and employed at Messrs. Fisher's lace-factory, at Nottingham, was described at the recent meeting of the British Association. The action of this machine is somewhat like the operation of the "plunger" machine in common use. The water is forced up through the centre of the machine by the action of a piston, and then falls through the lace which is being washed. The piston is worked by a lever, which is connected with a crank-wheel, driven by a steam-engine. The lace is placed in a cylinder, which is perforated with small holes, and which is made to revolve slowly on its axis



Relics of the Past.

DOMESDAY BOOK.

THE famous "Domesday Book," which we have this week selected for illustration among our "Relics of the Past," Sir Henry Spelman has pronounced to be, "if not the most ancient, yet without controversy the most venerable, monument of Great Britain." Of a book so celebrated and of such national value and importance it is surprising how little is known by the public at large: the representation of its exterior, and some account of the purposes for which it was compiled, can scarcely fail, therefore, to be of general interest. This memorable work, believed to be the oldest record of England, is the survey of the kingdom begun by William the Conqueror, from which judgment might be given upon the value, tenure, and services of all the lands in the country. The precise date when this celebrated survey was undertaken historians are not agreed about, though it is generally said to have been commenced in 1080 and completed in 1086. According to Ingulphus the inquisition was made in imitation of the policy of King Alfred, who, at the time he divided the kingdom into counties, hundreds, and tithings, had a survey taken and digested into a register, called, from the place where it was deposited, the "Roll of Winchester." This register Bishop Kennett affirms to have been called "Dom-boc," and conceives the "Domesday Book" to be a corruption of that title. The most diligent investigation, however, has not succeeded in tracing the slightest indication of any such survey in the time of Alfred, and his "Dom-boc" is believed to be in reality the code of Saxon laws. By some authorities the appellation "Domesday Book" was given to the Conqueror's survey because its decision upon questions of land tenure and the like was as indisputable as the sentence on the day of judgment.* Stow tells us that it was designated from having formerly been preserved in a place of the Church of Westminster or Winchester called "Domus Dei." The name, in all likelihood, is of Saxon parentage, and was intended to signify the book of judicial verdicts.

For the adjustment of the survey which it records, commissioners, named the King's Justiciaries, were appointed and sent into every county, and juries summoned and impannelled in each hundred out of all orders of freemen, from barons to the lowest gentlemen, to give in upon oath to the justiciaries, by verdict or presentment, due information for the faithful and impartial execution of the undertaking.† Upon such testimony the inquisitors were to learn the name of every place, who held it in the time of King Edward the Confessor, who was the present possessor, how many hides there were in the manor, how many carrucates‡ in the demesne, how many homagers, how many villans§, what freemen, what quantity of wood, how much meadow and pasture, what mills and fishponds, what the gross value in King Edward's time, what the present value, and how much each freeman or tenant had or has. All this was to be rigidly estimated—first, as the property was held in the time of the Confessor; then as it was bestowed by King William; and, lastly, as its value stood at the formation of the survey. These inquisitions being obtained were sent up to Winchester, and the substance of them was afterwards methodised and formed into the record now known as Domesday and deposited in the King's Exchequer.

The order commonly observed throughout this work is to set down at the head of every county the King's name, Rex Willielmus, and then to give a list of the Bishops, religious houses, churches, and eminent men, in the order of their rank, that held of the King in capite; likewise of his thanes, ministers, and servants, with a numerical figure in red ink before the letter denoting them in the books. In some counties the cities and capital boroughs are noticed, before the list of great tenants is entered, with the particular laws or customs which prevailed in each of them, while in others they are inserted promiscuously.‖

Every precaution appears to have been adopted by the Conqueror to ensure without oppression a faithful return. He evidently considered the survey an undertaking of importance, a character stamped by him soon after its completion bearing this remarkable inscription:—"Post descriptionem totius Angliæ," but his object in directing it has occasioned much speculation. By some he is considered to have been moved by an avaricious desire to increase his revenue; by others, to have been influenced by a sense of justice, that when an impost was levied it might fall with reasonable equality. Whatever the object, it was a wise and valuable undertaking.¶ By the completion of this survey, Sir Henry Ellis observes, "the King procured an exact knowledge of the possessions of the Crown. It furnished him the names of his tenants-in-chief; it furnished him with the means of ascertaining the military strength of the country; and it pointed out the possibility of increasing the revenue, in some cases, by lessening the demands of the tax-collector in others. It was, moreover, a register of appeal for those whose titles to their property might be disputed."

When the Domesday survey was first made, its title, "Liber de Wintonia," was so called that Winchester was its ancient and public depository. It seems, however, to have been soon removed to Westminster, where it was kept with the King's seal, by the side of the Tally Courts in the Exchequer-office locks and keys, in the chief charge of the Auditor, the Chamberlains and Deputy-Chamberlains of the Exchequer, until 1696, at which period it became their common records in the Chapter House. There it remained until a short time since, when it was removed to the Public Record Office, in Fetter-lane, where it is now carefully preserved.

The manuscript is in two volumes, one, of which we give an Engraving, is bound in wood, and covered with ancient binding, and is precisely similar to that of its companion, a thick quarto. The first is written on 382 double pages of vellum nearly all through in a hand, each page having a double column, and contains the description of thirty-one counties. The other volume contains 450 double pages of vellum, and is written in like manner in large fair characters, and contains the counties of Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk.

For ages, and during a long period, this priceless record is said to have been kept in the massive chest represented above. This chest, lined, ribbed, and clamped with iron, contains, it will be seen, another strong chest within it, which could not be lifted like the case itself; and in this inner receptacle, lined no doubt with some soft substance to protect them from damp, the volumes have been preserved so admirably that the writing is as fresh and distinct as if it were of the present century.

* The inchenamoti or escaetes were those inferior handowners who had lands in their own right, but held them of the Crown or Barons, though their tenures were absolutely copyhold, had yet an interest equal to a freehold.

THE VOLUNTEER SHAM FIGHT.

THE miniature battle which drew such a crowd of spectators to the beautiful neighbourhood of Chislehurst and Camden Place that one night have fancied the Derby Day returned passed off with considerable success, in spite of the double delay which intervened between the hour fixed for its commencement and the time when it began. The volunteers did their duty well, and the precision and regularity of the whole entitled them to considerable praise.

Previous to the signal for attack, which was given at seven o'clock, the first brigade of the two attacking division was formed up in the rear of Bickley Wood, and, as will be seen, they formed the left point of the attack. The brigade was about 1,400 strong, consisting of three battalions, the first under the command of the West Middlesex, under command of Major Compton, consisting of five companies of the West Middlesex Rifles, and one company of the Civil Service Rifles under command of Captain Wilkinson, consisting of two companies of the 14th Middlesex (Highgate); two companies of the 20th, or Hampstead Volunteers, commanded by Captain Cameron, and consisting of about 100 men; two companies of the 20th, or Railway Rifles, about eighty men, under Captain Warner; and one company of the Hampstead, under Captain Hall, about thirty men. The first battalion contained 4 of the 13th, Working Men's College, three companies, about 130 men; the 3rd Tower Hamlets, under Sir E. P. Buxton, two companies, of about 80 men; the 7th Surrey Rifles, under Major Perscefield, two companies, about 120 men; the 4th Surrey, under Captain Emmas; the 8th Surrey Rifles, Civil Service Team; and the 9th Surrey Rifles, under Captain Hastie. This brigade was under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Redstock and the Marquis of Abercorn. Lord Valetort and Major Duffy acted as Aides-de-Camp to the Commanders of this brigade. The second brigade, commanded by Colonel Thorold, was the strongest, and consisted of the South Middlesex in the 1st battalion by Major M'Pherson; the 2nd battalion by Major Farrell, consisting of the 3rd, 4th, 8th, 12th, 18th, 19th, and 24th Rifles; and the 3rd battalion, commanded by the Hon. Colonel Lindsay, consisting of the St. George's Rifles; Civil Service, Lord Bury's Regiment; General Peel's Own Scottish Rifles, 1st company; the Artists', Captain Phillips'; and the Barnet Rifles, Captain Taylor. This brigade was posted on the right of Bickley Wood, near St. Denis Pratt.

The signal for the battle having been given, a small body of the 3rd battalion of the first division, consisting of the 7th and 20th Middlesex Volunteers (all six-feet men, and wearing scarlet uniforms), together with the Engineers, under the command of Captain Jebens, entered the park, and opened fire upon the wood at the western end of Bickley Park, and this force was driven back upon the main body of the attacking force were suddenly called upon to make a retreat with as little loss as possible. Being without cavalry and artillery, the only resource was to throw out skirmishers, which manœuvre was executed with amazing rapidity and in excellent order by the men under Colonel Hicks's command. The retreat, however, was well executed at the parties gradually retreated down the hill from the wood towards the brook. Arrived at the brook, they formed up into a solid mass, and they again marched up to the wood and opened fire. Upon this a large body of the enemy emerged from the wood and formed in extended columns, the skirmishers at the same moving forward from the advance posting in successive volleys with excellent precision. The skirmishers retreated with what little ammunition they had left through the wood where they had at first been placed, when a column of the defending force marched up to the front, and returned the fire in a beautiful manner in separate companies, until finally the whole strength of the battalion. The latter then retired to a very favourable position behind some limekilns, where they rallied and met the advancing party, consisting of the 3rd, 11th, 19th, and 20th Middlesex, and the 4th, 7th, 8th, and 9th Surreys, Truman and Hanbury's Brewery Rifles, and the West Middlesex, with a very severe fire, which echoed over the hills, and brought the leaves down from the trees in thousands, like a storm of wind in October. Ultimately, however, the limekilns were taken, as the Russian despatches used to say, "after a long fire of a single man," and from this point a change was made in the subsequent movements of the two bodies.

It was now evident that the attack made upon Colonel Hicks's division was but a feint to cut off his retreat with the City Brigade, the Six-foot Guards, and the 12th and 53rd Kent. The main attack was clearly coming from the right of the enemy, and Colonel Hicks accordingly extended his left upon the slope of the hills, facing the enemy's columns, now drawn up in close line. The absence of artillery alone prevented this from being a commanding position, as with a few guns he could have made terrible havoc amongst the troops in the valley below.

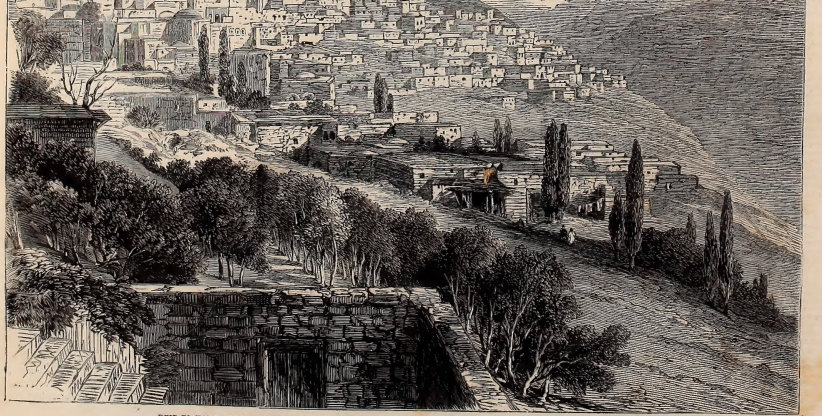
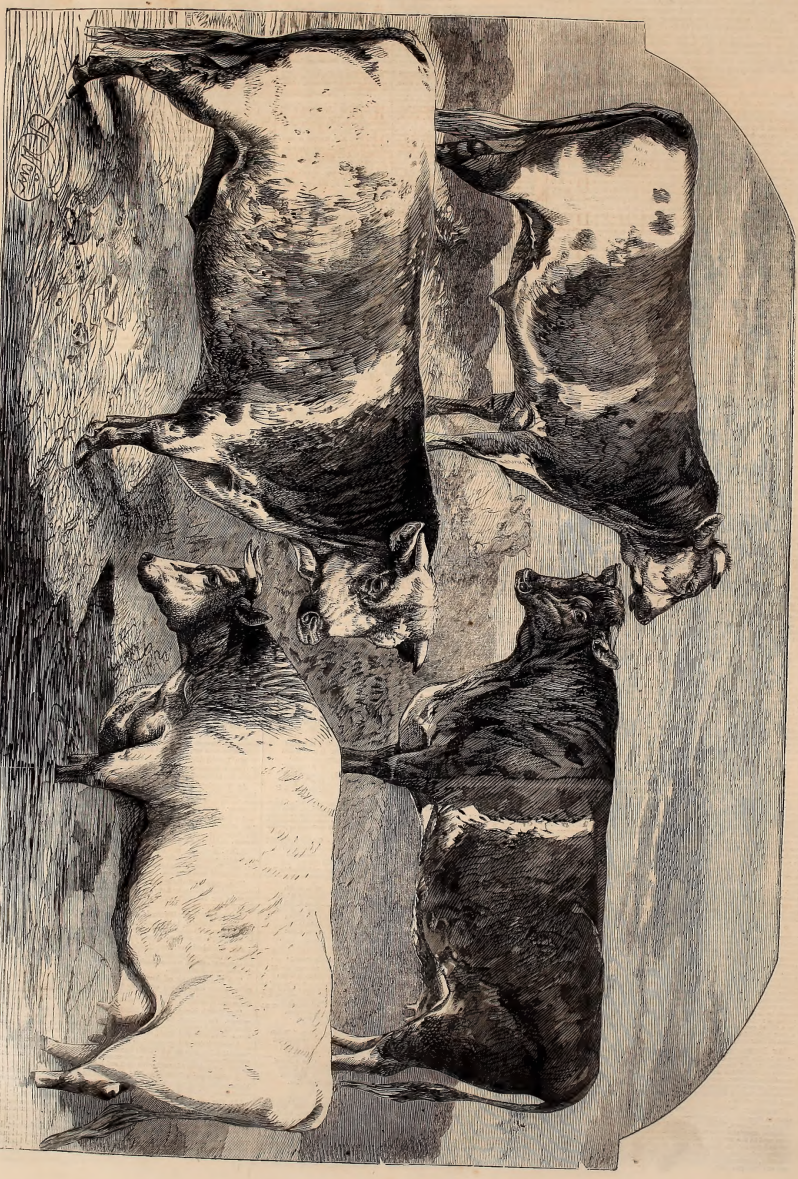
The second division, forming up in contiguous columns of companies in a field at a short distance to the south of the park, was now seen in motion. The South Middlesex Rifles, under Major M'Pherson, cautiously advanced and threw out some of their skirmishers, but, seeing the enemy in great force on the hills, fell back, after exchanging a few shots with the outposts of the enemy. The second battalion now came on the ground in great force. It consisted of the 8th, 13th, 18th, 21st, 25th, 34th, 3rd, 4th, and 16th, Kent Rifles—and was followed by the third, consisting of the St. George's, the Paddington, the Scottish, the Civil Service, the Artists', and the Barnet Rifles. The volunteers had now shown the whole of their strength, and Colonel Hicks carefully reconnoitred the forces opposed to him. At last, however, after some marching and countermarching, the second brigade, led by Colonel Thorold, advanced up the hill crowned with the yet unconquered battalions of Citizens and Men of Kent. They reserved their fire until the men were well within range, and then, hurriedly calling in their skirmishers, poured in a terrific fire upon the advancing line. This was one of the finest sights of the day. The evening was getting just a trifle dusky, the brightness of the sun had ceased, and in this slightly-diminished daylight the lines of fire at each discharge were seen distinct and bright through the white smoke which partially concealed the men. With the rapidity of lightning the small tongues of flame played from the right of companies along the extended line; and then came one, and another, and another simultaneous well-delivered volley, which seemed as though the crest of the hill were vomiting fire and smoke. It was readily replied to by the attacking party, who, however, showed some signs of weakness, owing, no doubt, to the steep ascent which they had to climb. At length, however, they wavered, turned their backs on the enemy, and retreated in the most admired confusion down the hill, their retreat causing immense laughter to the thousands of spectators, and in which the volunteers, as they came helter-skelter down the hill, joined as heartily as they could. The gallant Colonel had, however, made one omission—he neglected to protect his right flank. The division that had taken possession of the limekilns had rallied their forces, and were seen advancing in line along the slope of the hill. Thorold saw that the time had come when his discomfited brigade might retrieve the laurels which they had lost. The men were lying down to avoid the fire of the enemy, and the gallant Brigadier, seeing the decisive moment had arrived, and following an illustrious example, shouted, "Up, Guards, and at 'em!" The commanders of battalions and regimental officers gave a ready response. The ditch—we beg pardon, the river—was crossed. An officer of one of the corps, bearing a small green flag, dashed in like the Roman standard-bearer; his men followed. There was a general advance up the hotly-contested hill; Hicks, the victorious, experienced the vicissitudes of war, and was in turn the vanquished commander. The South Middlesex were the first to obtain possession of the height; and these, aided by supports from the other division and battalion, gradually pushed on, following up the totally-defeated defending party, who retired, however, in excellent order to the extreme eastern limit of the park, where victory was declared to be on the side of Viscount Ranelagh and his gallant Brigadiers, Lord Radstock and Colonel Thorold. As the victorious troops swept past the grand stand and drove the enemy before them they were loudly cheered, and the greatest enthusiasm was displayed by the spectators.

The grand event of the day was now concluded; and the sun, as his last rays glistened upon the bayonets of the men marching to bivouac over the brow of the hill, seemed to smile approvingly upon the efforts of that earnest and patriotic band.

An Engraving illustrating the principal event in the Sham Fight is in preparation, and will appear in the next Number of this Journal.



MR. EDWARD ROSS, THE RIFLE CHAMPION OF ENGLAND.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY CLAUDET.



THE "CHAMPION SHOT" OF ENGLAND.

THE birthplace of Homer was a subject of dispute, and no noble Lords honoured young Edward Ross by claiming him, on the platform of the Crystal Palace, for their respective counties. Mr. Ross is, however, a thoroughbred Highlander. He is the fifth son of Horatio Ross, Esq., of Netherley, a very keen sportsman, formerly member of Parliament for Montrose; and his mother is one of the old clan of the Macnee of Eintull, in Ross-shire. Mr. Edward Ross was born and brought up in Kincardine. He began practising with a small rifle when only five or six years of age, and his father always predicted that he would turn out one of the best deer-stalkers in the kingdom—a prophecy fulfilled by his winning the "blue ribbon" of the rifle when only in his nineteenth year. He killed his first stag when ten years old, and has ever since been known as one of the surest shots at deer in the north of Scotland. His eye long practised to search for deer at great distances, he had a great advantage over most of his competitors at the long ranges. He, however, proved equally successful at the short distances, having defeated the two crack Swiss shots, Messrs. Nourisson and Knetch, in shooting for the ladies of Northampton prize at 300 yards. Mr. Ross laboured like some others under the disadvantage of not knowing the sighting of his rifle, with which he had never shot until Saturday morning: in consequence he had to throw away two shots at each range to prove the proper angle of elevation, which makes the number of points scored by him the more remarkable, as, in fact, he made 24 points at 800, 900, and 1000 yards, with 24 shots, the other six shots having been thrown away to sight the rifle.

A contemporary says of the victor when the prizes were given:—"Mr. Ross, the winner of the Royal prize, was no stranger by the time Lord Elcho arrived at that announcement. He had appeared and taken off two minor prizes. When called to receive the Queen's prize of £250 the band struck up 'See the conquering hero comes,' and the applause that had greeted him before was redoubled. He bore his honours with great quietness of manner, receiving the prize just as coolly as he shot for it. He is tall, slight, and very youthful in appearance. He was congratulated on his skill and success by the president, the different members of the council, and a host of friends: among them was his father, the famous deerstalker. Mr. Ross was called on to show his gold medal, and, finally, to put it on: he held it up to the spectators, but could not comply with the other request—the medal had no 'fixings.'"

SHORTHORN PRIZE-WINNERS AT CANTERBURY.

THE shorthorns, both in numbers and point of attraction, formed so completely the kernel of the Royal Show that we have confined our illustrations to some of the principal winners among them.

Malachite, the winner of the yearling bull class, is a dark roan, nearly eighteen months old, by Duke of Moscow (14,447), from a Cheriton cow. Mr. Jonathan Peel, his owner, has recently formed a herd at Knowsley Hermitage, near Clitheroe, which includes some valuable purchases from Mr. Booth's and elsewhere: but this is, we believe, the first time that he has gained a prize at the Royal.

Colonel Towneley has once more realised the words of Punch—

> My Butterflies in summer bloom,
> And smile the winter through;

and Royal Butterfly, after knowing but one check in his bull-calf days at Chester, when he was obliged from illness to be taken out of the yard, has had all opposition as defiance in the show-yard completely as Beauty's Butterfly did last Christmas at the Smithfield and Birmingham Fat Shows. He is a son of Frederick and Old Butterfly, which were, we believe, nearly if not the very first bull and heifer that Colonel Towneley ever bred, after purchasing their dams, Beauty and Rosamond, at the sale agent Mr. Eastwood's, of Mr. Booth's Jeweller, and unites the Brampton Rose and Lux blood. For some years Colonel Towneley has exhibited but by the Colonel's request; and since he was was installed at Towneley the unbeaten Master Butterfly, Roan Duchess 2nd, Blanche 6th, Ringlet (which was sold to Mr. Douglas Baird), and Rosamond, have the chief of the Frederick and Frederick 2nd, and Royal Butterfly, have been the principal of his vast family of Towneley Butterfly, the dam of Beauty and Master Butterfly, carried off thirty prizes in her day, including all the female prizes in succession at the Royal, and, crossing the Channel, she added to her store the Agricultural Exchange Cup at Armagh, beating Mr. Booth's Wanda; and Rosamond at the last time of asking. With the exception of the Chester Meeting, and what Mr. Eastwood's Queen Bee lent him at the Durham County Show for the prize for the best animal in the yard, Royal Butterfly has never known a check, and, in fact, he was never run hard but once, and then only in the estimation of one out of four judges, by Prince of Prussia at the Royal Lancashire. He is nearly three years old, and three of his progeny were selected at the Canterbury show. The Towneley herd consists of from fifty to sixty head, and it contributes from twenty-five to thirty calf entries annually to "The Herd Book." Such is its high management and celebrity under Mr. Culshaw that, in the year of Master Butterfly's sale, stock was sold out of it to the amount of £6,000, and yet at the end of the year it was, without the aid of any purchases, as numerous as at the beginning.

Wood Rose, the property of Mr. Henry Ambler, of Watkinson Hall, near Halifax, is by a son of Mr. Ambler's Grand Turk, from Woodbine by Baron Warlaby, a winner of some eighteen prizes. She is about two years and three months old, and a dark roan. Her crops are one of her most taking points just now, and also, in addition to the qualities we mentioned last week, a nice open head and plenty of good thick flesh. In other but clean is rather deficient. She has a couple of some prizes before counting, but the fame of Duchess 77th had caused her to be rather overlooked.

Rustic, by the Earl of Derby (12,810), from Ross, the winner in the cow class, is the property of Mr. Eastwood, of Swinshawe, near Halifax, by whom he was bred by Mr. Wetherell, the celebrated breeder, who has been so truly styled the "Nestor of Shorthorns," and is very little more than four years old, but with most wonderful development for her age. She

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE condition of things Parliamentary to the practised observer augurs the beginning of the end. Large Houses, early and late sittings, feverish energy, bustle and confusion, portend the consciousness that the time for doing what any one wants to do is being compressed into a period that may almost be counted by hours. It is like that last struggle of a harpooned whale which is technically called its "flurry:" there is much splashing about before the monster subsides into dead quiet. On an evening in this week the "paper" of business had mounted into a volume, and there were fifty-two orders of the day set down besides questions, notices of motion, and amendments. This was, no doubt, a fitting occasion for Mr. Newdegate to bring on a motion, somewhat Irish in its nature on the face of it, inasmuch as it sought to contract the number of hours which the House should devote to the cause of matters before it. But it was, nevertheless, judicious, and might, if fairly adopted, have done something towards getting rid of the work; for on examination it would have been found that it was directed against that plague of talk which has been the curse of the Session. There are in the House sundry minor celebrities, of whom Mr. Hennessy may, in an especial degree, be taken as a type, who, possessing no real qualification for their position as legislators in the abstract, are obliged, in the exercise of their functions, to keep themselves always prominent, are self-seeking career about—a sort of Parliamentary gadflies—and perpetually bring about the sort of Parliamentary scene which setting on points of debate for the purpose of moving adjournments and creating diversities into the leaders of small minorities. How irritating the everlasting flutter of these ephemera is, only those who suffer from them can tell; and perhaps nothing could be so much to the angular good-will and kind feeling which every one bears towards Sir Benjamin Hall's solution in the case of the Irish Members as the Lord Palmerston in his character as leader of the House—the patience and long-forbearance with which he treats this class of members. In truth, his mode of dealing with them—his fooling them to the top of their bent—would be objectionable, if it were not executed, were it not that one knows that, with all his nonchalance and seeming carelessness, he always acts upon a preconceived plan. In this case it would seem to be his design to give these small deer rope enough in the hope that the proverbial result will follow. If there were in nature, which we believe there are not, such phenomena as persons who were dumb without being deaf, what an idea it would be to infuse a hundred and fifty of them into the House of Commons! In that case the work might be done, and the dog days in London avoided.

One of the most notable circumstances of the last few days is the evident recovery of Mr. Gladstone from the gloom that hung over him. By reason of those processes of relief from suffering of which he is a master he has, it would appear, reconciled himself to his position in the Ministry and in the House, which has been at least incongruous, if not spiritless, and, with the experience of his own sensitiveness to anything he does, having convinced himself of the necessity or the propriety of a certain course, he has flung himself heart and soul into it, and now he is most ingeniously shows that, although he and his chief colleagues are wide asunder in opinions, they can agree in action. To be sure, he has had a powerful solution in the fact that it has been his duty to revel in a financial statement. On Monday, having to state how he was to provide for the estimate for the Army, he was in his most characteristic vein, was all saules and graciousness, and laughed so heartily at some of the Premier's pleasantries, that for the first time in my long acquaintance with him this present chronicler discovered what kind of teeth he possessed. The thorough enjoyment with which he settled into his statement was more than enjoyment; and the manner in which he put with which he put together that piece of financial mosaic which, when completed, showed a sort of man of war in full sail, was one of equally a study and an admiration to his hearers as it was palpably an actual delight to himself. The voice of the charmer went now thrilling, now throbbing, through the House's ears, and the listeners sat rapt and with that undefined sense of pleasure with which the ear takes in a melodic, cyrus sounds of a full band. Even Sir H. Willoughby seemed as if he was willing to be "wood again and be again deceived." One thing was certain, and that was, a conviction that somehow or the other we could say nothing to him. He had slipped out of the meshes of a difficulty from which it was supposed he could not have extricated himself, except by the aid of a financial man. Before parting with this Clusa question it may be mentioned that on a previous evening it was at least under discussion from a point of view more immediately connected with the object and policy of the war; it was worth observing the personal attitude and capabilities of the Government. In that debate, of the Premier's speech, there was not one voice, great or small, raised on behalf of the Ministry; while, on the contrary, ideas were coming to hand and to mind on the part of the House from guns of every calibre, beginning with Mr. Bullie Cochrane particularly smooth-bore pompom. Yet the Government not only held their own, but returned the fire with energy and considerable weight of metal. Mr. Sidney Herbert, Sir Charles Wood, Mr. Gladstone, Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston, one after the other, poured over with vigour and effect; and one could not but admire the debating power which was then concentrated, and which enabled the Ministry to defend themselves when standing alone and wholly unsupported. It ought in justice in this page, where only lately there has been a record of the brilliant speech and success of Lord John Russell, to head this of discussion this week he has displayed a vigour, a point, and an aptitude in certain speeches which he has delivered which we gladly did not think remained in him. This was especially the case when he took part in the debate on the Savoy question, introduced by Sir Robert Peel in a speech so brief that it was downright unkind to him that he did not make a joke, good or bad, and which, therefore, was in him counted for a supererogation, and which elicited from the Premier only a "pooh, pooh" and pompous platitude in the other and feebler denouncers of the Napoleonic policy in the House of Commons, which caused one to desire that he had written but one book, that he had also made but one speech, and that one had not heard even that.

Would that we were possible to give an idea of the combination of Irish and metropolitan membership! It is in vain to attempt it. If you take an acute lawyer and a man of the world, and convert him into a metropolitan member, at once he is something else than a lawyer-man; but when Lord Mount-Coffeehouse, the Irish peer, is regarded as only Irish Member, the result is not that he is a Parliamentary "man of mouchette" and pompous platitude in the other and feebler denouncers of the Napoleonic policy in the House of Commons, which caused one to desire that he had written but one book, that he had also made but one speech, and that one had not heard even that.

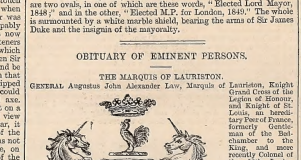
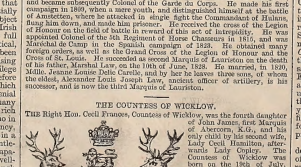
NEW DRINKING-FOUNTAIN IN FLEET-STREET.



THE interesting ceremony of opening a new drinking-fountain, erected in Fleet-street, by Sir James Duke, Bart., M.P., and Alderman of the ward of Farringdon Without, in front of the parish church of St. Dunstan-in-the-West, took place on Wednesday week in the presence of Sir James Duke, Bart., the Rev. Mr. Archer Gurney, and numerous other gentlemen. The design is of the classic order, the base being surmounted by a niche, at the top of which is a dolphin basin with the water issuing from the mouth. Round the basin are festoons of flowers, carved in beautiful marble. The ground is of Welsh marble, and all the rest of Italian marble. The inscription is as the following inscription—"The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life;" and round the edge of the niche are these words—"The gift of Sir James Duke, Bart., M.P., Alderman of this Ward." On the top corners are two cows, in one of which are these words, "Erected Lord Mayor's Day, 1848;" and in the other, "Erected M.P. for London, 1849." The whole is surmounted by a white marble shield, bearing the arms of Sir James Duke and the insignia of the mayoralty.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE MARQUIS OF LAURISTON.



GENERAL Augustus John Alexander Law, Marquis of Lauriston, Knight Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, and Knight of St. Louis, is the hereditary Peer of France, formerly Grand Chamberlain of the Bathchamber to the King, and more recently Colonel of the 15th Legion of the Loire et Cher Guard, and a member of the Legislative Assembly, who died at Paris on the 27th ultimo, was the representative of one of the most remarkable families in France and Scotland—the Laws of Lauriston, the Bernard Barks, in his post-publication record several of "Vicissitudes of Families," and the elaborate article on the Laws, writes thus:—"The family of Law, of which the Laws of Lauriston are an distinguished branch, is of very ancient standing in Scotland, and has made itself illustrious as well by its own deeds as by its numerous alliances with the very first of the Scottish nobility. Out of Scotland the rank and fame it has achieved are singular. In France the celebrity of the Laws of Lauriston is historic; and another line of the Laws which settled in England can boast of the nature and importance of the banking business it has established in divinity and jurisprudence, has obtained." The Marquis of Lauriston, the subject of this notice, was the elder son (the younger is Alexander Count Sopocan Law) of James Bernard Law, a Marshal of France, one of Napoleon I.'s most gallant and unscrupulous lieutenants, the Duke of Amiens to London, and the hero of the desperate battle of Goldberg, who was made a Count by Napoleon, and created Marquis of Lauriston by Louis XVIII. The great-great-uncle of the Marquis just deceased was the famous financier John Law, Comptroller-General of the Finances of France in 1720. The Marquis himself was born in 1790, and, adopting the warlike profession of his father, Sir Marshal, was an officer of considerable distinction, and became subsequently Colonel of the Garde du Corps. He made his first campaign in 1809, when he was only, and distinguished himself at the battle of Austerlitz, where he attacked in single fight the Commandant of Hulsen, flung him down, and made him prisoner. He received the cross of the Legion of Honour on the field of battle in reward of this act of intrepidity. He was appointed Colonel of the 6th Regiment of Horse Chasseurs in 1813, and Marechal de Camp in the Spanish campaign of 1823. He obtained many foreign orders, as well as the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour and the Cross of St. Louis. He succeeded as second Marquis of Lauriston on the death of his father, Marshal Law, on the 10th of June, 1828. He married, in 1817, Melle. Jeanne Louise Delle Castle, and by her he leaves three sons, of whom the eldest, Alexander Count Joseph Law, is a distinguished officer of artillery, is his successor, and is now the third Marquis of Lauriston.

THE COUNTESS OF WICKLOW.

The Right Hon. Cecil Frances, Countess of Wicklow, was the fourth daughter of Abercorn, K.G., and his wife Cecil, by his second wife, Lady Cecil Hamilton, afterwards Copley, and the Countess of Wicklow was born on the 19th of July, 1813, and was married, on the 16th of February, 1833, to William Howard, K.B., Earl and present Earl of Wicklow, and has had seven daughters, of whom three survive her—viz., Lady Frances, wife of the Hon. Colin Lindsay, younger son of the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres; Anne Jane, Lady Ashbrook, widow of Henry Bulkeley Philipps Philips, late Lord Milford; and Catherine, wife of the Hon. Arthur Pere. The Countess of Wicklow died at Brighton on the 7th inst.

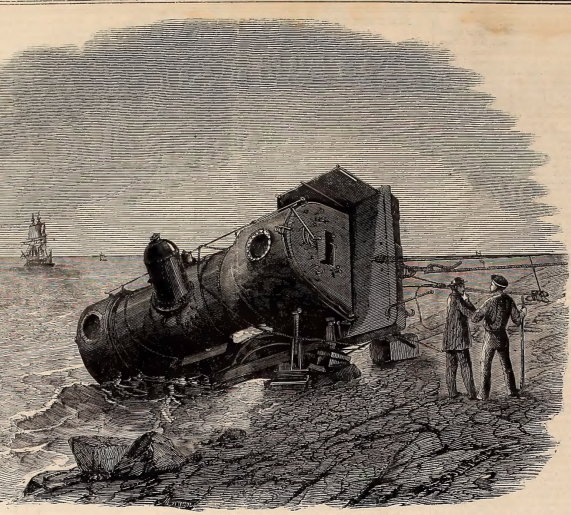
SIR WILLIAM HORNE, Q.C.

SIR William Horne, who died on the 13th inst., at his town house, 49, Upper Harley-street, was the son of the late Rev. Thomas Horne, of Chiswick, D.D., and was born in 1771. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn in 1794, and rose to great eminence in the Court of Chancery. He was made a King's Counsel in 1818, and Solicitor-General and Attorney-General under Lord Grey's Administration. He was knighted in 1830. He represented Helston in the Parliament chosen in 1812, and after that Newport, in the Isle of Wight, and, lastly, when the borough of Marylebone was created under the Reform Bill of 1832, he was returned one of its members. In 1834 he ceased to be Attorney-General, having refused a Common Law Judgeship as Baron of the Exchequer. He was a Bencher of the two principal Inns of the Masters of the Court of Chancery, and held that office until it was abolished. Sir William was twice married, and leaves a daughter, Miss Horne, Bedford, Esq., of Flitwick, in Bedfordshire; and, secondly, Anne, widow of Henry Davidson, Esq., of Penfold, Surrey.



COLONEL UNETT.

COLONEL Walter Unett died on the 6th inst., at his residence, The Oaks, Leasington, in the forty-sixth year of his age. Colonel Unett was late of the 9th Light Dragoons, in which regiment he had served upwards of twenty-four months, and he died three weeks after leaving it. He was the sixth and youngest son of the late Mr. Thomas Unett, Esq., of Broadfield, Bredbury, Cheshire, in the county of Stafford, and was brother of the late Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Unett, who was killed at the battle of Ferozeshah, 1845. Walter Unett entered the British Army as a Cornet in 1833, and became a Captain in 1839. He was Aide-de-Camp to Sir Jas. Lyon in 1841, and was present at the forcing of the Khyber Pass, and the other memorable engagements of that campaign, under Major-General Sir Robert Sale, K.C.B. He was in the Army of the Punjaub in 1848-9, and shared in the victories of Chillianwallah and Goojerat. Unett's gallant conduct here as an officer gained for him the advancement of the 9th Light Dragoons at the forcing of the Khyber Pass, was noticed with praise in general orders, and he received the commission of Major by the brevet of 1851. He died on the 13th of September, 1852, when he changed a body of Afghan horsemen over some of the batteries at the battle of Chillianwallah and Goojerat. He was wounded severely at Chillianwallah, and he received a distinguished-service pension of £100 per annum. Colonel Unett was also present in the campaign of Afghanistan, and a silver medal and two clasps for that of the Punjaub. He was made an Ensign in 1841, and a Lieutenant-Colonel the 20th of June, 1854; and a Colonel the 20th of June, 1857. He retired from the Army on the 26th of December, 1854. Colonel Unett, who has never married; but we are happy to learn that he leaves two nephews, John and Henry Unett, now to their brother's descendants in his old regiment—the 3rd Light Dragoons. A public sense of Colonel Unett's courage and conduct, at the battle of Chillianwallah, was evinced by the Sheffield people giving him in his native town of Birmingham. He was one of those who bore a banner at the funeral of the Duke of Wellington.

THE INTERNATIONAL STATISTICAL CONGRESS.

ON Monday the fourth session of the Congress was opened in due form by his Royal Highness Prince Albert in the great hall of King's College, which was crowded with delegates, statesmen, and men of literature and science from all parts of the world. The opening of the Congress by so illustrious a preliminary business was transacted, the rules being confirmed and the officers appointed. The Prince of Wales was in the gallery of the hall, and received in the centre hall by a guard of honour of the King's College Volunteers. His Royal Highness then took the chair, and delivered to it his brief address on the inaugural address.

The Prince's speech was a most able exposition of the general principles of the science, and a composition which the highest name in science would not disdain to claim. "Statistics," said his Royal Highness, "is marked by a cordial and unaffected sympathy, in large and liberal exposition, in breadth of grasp and logical power, in the selection of its materials, in patience of research, in searching and comprehensive glances at immediate objects and distant aims, in the caution of conclusion, in the application of principles to cases of detail, in happy illustration, in austere elegance of language, this address is worthy of more than a passing notice. Statistics is a certain power, a certain sovereign air, and without a grand humility—a Teutonic love of abstract speculation for its own sake—it is a science of practical utility, and it is also a science for the study of philosophical principles. It is a science of facts, a religious fearlessness in pursuit of truth." The Prince defines with nicety and exactness the true province of statistical science, and points out that in attempting to disguise that England—though the originator of this international congress, from the first to ignore statistical science—is more likely to derive the greatest benefits from its achievements—has much to learn from other nations, and a more rapid progress to be supplied with all the timorous fallacy, or the rash presumption, that the study of statistics is the opening of revolutionary doctrines. The objects of the Congress are clearly defined in the Prince's own words:—"We give to the Congress our sanction, and express our confidence in the hope that the meeting will not only satisfy the legitimate curiosity of the scientific inquirer, but will recommend itself to the practical statesman, by showing that it is not only consistent with, but favourable to, the progress of true political economy." The Prince then proceeds to show that the science is of a character which a handful of soil can rest, every cranny to which a vine can cling, every ledge on which a mulberry can stand, is occupied. The people, too, now nearly all Christians, have a thrifty, well-to-do look; and the children, thanks to the energy of the American missionaries, are well taught. The town suffered greatly during the war between the Christians and Druses some twelve years ago; many of its houses were burned, and many of the best and bravest of its youth fell in battle. It has now almost completely recovered, and few marks of the unhappy contest remain visible."

Intelligence has been received from Syria of new pillagings, burnings, and massacres, an account of which will be found in another column.

DREADFUL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

On Sunday se'nnight an accident of a melancholy nature occurred between Trinity and Granton, on the line of the Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway, by which four lives were lost and five or six persons seriously injured. The ordinary Sunday evening passenger-train for the North leaves Edinburgh at 4.30 p.m. The accident occurred to the engine and tender while they were returning to the locomotive station in Scotland-street, after having safely conveyed the passenger-train to Granton. There were on the engine and tender at the time of the accident six persons—namely, David Mathieson, the engine-driver; John M'Kenzie Mathieson, the engine-driver's son, a boy of about eight years of age; John M'Kenzie, a brother-in-law of the engine-driver; Andrew Morgan, a pointsman in Scotland-street station; James Bolan, the stoker; and George Dall, a railway porter. The engine had just left Granton about five o'clock, and was proceeding rapidly along the line, which at that point runs close to the sea on a high embankment, when, from some unknown cause, the engine and tender went off the rails at a point opposite Wardie Cottages, a little to the westward of Wardie Hotel, and dashed over the embankment into the sea, a distance of about thirty feet, carrying with them the railing of a bridge, which at that point crosses the road, and a portion of the low parapet-wall skirting the line. Mathieson, the engine-driver, his son, his brother-in-law, and Morgan, the pointsman, were killed on the spot; Bolan, the stoker, who jumped off immediately before the engine went over the embankment, escaped with a dislocated shoulder. Dall, the porter, had a marvellous escape with his life. He was carried over the embankment, and fell down the stone bulwark; close to the sea, it being nearly high water at the time. He was severely bruised by the fall, and cut about the head, besides being much scalded in the face by the steam from the engine. The accident also resulted in injury to several persons who happened at the time to be sitting on the stone bulwarks beneath the railway, on the north side, some of whom narrowly escaped with their lives. Within three-quarters of an hour after the accident Sheriff Gordon was on the spot, as were also Mr. Lee, Chief Constable of the county, and Mr. Brown, Deputy Procurator Fiscal. The engine was lying bottom upwards on the beach, a little to the eastward of the point at which it had gone over the embankment, while the tender lay close behind it on its side.

RELEASE OF POLITICAL PRISONERS AT PALERMO.

THE accompanying Illustration represents the triumphal progress of Baron Riso and other political prisoners along the Via Maqueda after their release, on the 19th of June, from the Fort of Castellamare, where they had been kept in confinement since the 5th of April. The ovation they received was wonderful; and what assisted greatly to heighten the effect of the scene was the fact of the young Baroness being in the carriage with her husband, whom, at point in the procession was so overcome with joy that he did nothing but dance by the side of the carriage in which the released prisoners were seated, and shout, with the full force of his lungs, which were uncommonly strong, "Evviva l'Italia!" "Evviva Garibaldi," &c.

Our Artist, in forwarding the sketch which forms the subject of the annexed Engraving, with other sketches which will duly appear in this Journal, says—"My next sketches and letters will be from the interior, and I trust they will not be found wanting in interest. The expedition which we are going on (one which was started under the command of General Türr, but which is now, we believe, under that of Colonel Ebor) is likely to be prolific of adventure; and I hope to find ample material for both pencil and pen."

SYRIA.—COMING EVENTS.

WHATEVER may be the exact cause and the immediate spring of the fearful massacres which have deluged Syria and Damascus with blood, there can be but one opinion with regard to the necessity for putting a stop to a state of things from the contemplation of which the coldest heart and the most impassive feelings must ever shrink. No doubt the strong hand must intervene, and without delay. But a very moderate consideration of the subject will lead to the conclusion that the complete settlement of the question is surrounded by difficulties and pregnant with complications. In that land where "all save the spirit of man is divine," the jostling together of adverse religious faiths has created a number of antagonistic populations whose chief care is to watch each other, either for the purpose of offence or defence. The haughty Mussulman, with his pride of place, the Jews, the Christians of both the Greek and Latin Churches, and the professors, secret or avowed, of the old Heathen faiths of Syria are mixed up together in a chaos of religious passions, always charged with latent fire, and ever ready to break out into death and destruction. Sometimes a Mussulman is ready to run against the Jews; again, Mussulmans are severely murdered; now Heathen and Christian, represented respectively by the Druses and Maronites, come into bloody collision. This is but a faint idea of the normal condition of a land which still retains the epithet of holy—which has been for the most part the cradle of the religious faiths which have pervaded the world, and the representatives of almost all of which are gathered together in a social whole, as if for the very purpose of contest and mutual hostility. Over them all is spread a rule which is powerless for good, impotent to restrain or curb the passions and the unlawful actions of its liege, but active and capable in oppression, and which seems to be guided by a policy which consists in setting the contending sections of the population against each other, so that in the midst of their convulsions they might not spy out the positive weakness of the Turkish Executive.

It has long been more than suspected that a new impulse had been given to the religious discord which exists in those regions by the influence of Mussulman intrigue. It has for several years been palpable that the inhabitants of Syria, Arabia, and Palestine live in a condition which to call unsettled were to use a very weak term indeed. Their predisposition was such as to render necessary an interposition so powerful as to give some guarantee for peace and order—an interposition which the Turkish authorities were in the first place not strong enough to adopt, and which, even if they had been, were probably neither willing nor anxious to attempt. Nothing, however, was done, and the consequence has been the indiscriminate slaughter of whole tribes in the Lebanon, the laying waste of whole districts, and the perpetration of cruelties which could only accompany the rage of the most debased religionists steeled to every sentiment of humanity. It is now understood that the original quarrel in the present instance arose from the acts of the Maronites. This accounts for much of that strong feeling against the Christian population which prevails in the Syrian territory, and which has excited some surprise in Europe. This fact lessens the difficulty of dealing with the present question. It is not necessary to make it a matter which concerns the rights and wrongs of the Christians alone, although no one will grudge those who have been the real sufferers in the direful events which have occurred the deepest sympathy. Whatever may be the religious faiths and their creeds which have existed here by their blood and their distresses, and the only matter for consideration is how this disturbed region is to be brought within the pale of civilised order. There is one universal admission that the Porte is unequal to the situation. That being so, the Treaty of 1856 comes into operation, and the Powers which were parties to the engagements of that treaty are simply bound to intervene, nominally to protect the Christian subjects of the Sultan, but really to stop the effusion of blood, and to act as a general police over the whole population of these unsettled territories. Accordingly, there seems to be a ready and concurrent agreement on the part of all the great European Powers in the necessity of action, and that immediate and direct. As usual, the most nimble, the most eager, and the most ambitious Power is first in the field, acting while the telegraph is busying with messages, and while Ambassadors and Ministers for Foreign Affairs are conversing with diplomatic reticence, and exercising each other in their old art of tongue-fence. First a division, and then a corps-d'armée, is said to be on its way from France to Syria. Russia looks on well pleased, owning, perhaps, to a confidence in some secret understanding that the first moves in her direction are not to be played with French pieces. In the meantime England sends a small naval squadron to the coast, with a permission to land a handful of marines, who are on no account to venture out of sight of the ships. No doubt he would have been a bold Minister who would at this moment have come down to Parliament and asked for a subsidy for the purpose of transferring a division of British troops from Aldershott to the Lebanon. Neither is it possible exactly to blame the readiness of Lord John Russell to comply with the request of the French Government that France should occupy the whole or the greater part of the expeditionary corps to Syria. The exigency is pressing, and cannot be adequately met by a demonstration of vessels of war on the coast and the few sentinels which they could supply for duty on shore from the scanty force of marines which they have on board. Clearly, England has not a sufficient regular land forces to the disposal. The eagle flight of despotism in a matter like this contrasts favourably with the tortoise pace of constitutional government.

Nevertheless, while admitting the peculiarity of the situation, and the singular necessity of the case, we cannot but express an opinion that the Foreign Affairs which he could not effectually or safely resist, it is impossible to be blind to the complications in the future to which the mode and means which it has been found indispensable to adopt in quelling the disturbances in Syria may give rise. The appearance of a French force of 25,000 men in Syria is calculated to cause at least a mental inquiry when we are likely to be witnesses of its disappearance. Is it true that for several years agents, with all the aspect of being accredited, have been preparing the minds of the Christian population for the advance of a French army in Syria? It is almost on the cards that in any arrangements for the pacification and the future good government of that part of the dominions of the Sultan some material guarantee will be established. Is that guarantee to be a permanent occupation of the country by French troops? Russians, faint perhaps, but shaped and consistent, have been afloat of some occult and mystic agreement between France and Russia with reference to the Turkish empire. The footfalls of the cat-like policy of Russia are scarcely heard in these events, but are they the less swift and certain? Whatever betides, it will be the duty of England to watch carefully the proceedings in this affair of Syria, and to guard against the danger of the absolute necessity of direct European interference being turned into a means of furthering the ambition of one and, perhaps, two European Powers.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS

FRANCE.

The Emperor visited the camp at Chalons early in the week.

The Corps Législatif finished the Budgets and its existence for the season, and no one can deny, says the Guardian correspondent at Paris, that the session expired amidst a flourish of trumpets. Its latest act was to renew the patent of Mr. Sax's horns, called saxotrombas and saxophone, for fifteen years. The debate was as noisy as the subject, and produced much "hilarity," especially when, an honourable member informing the House that the "horns" had furnished matter for a six years' lawsuit, M. de Maury exemplified the fact that such a fact was "very much to the honour of Messieurs les Avocats!" The army establishment was voted on the principle that an army of 600,000 men is necessary "for the defence of France and to meet all contingencies which may arise." General Allard, the commissary of the Government, stated on the 1st of June that the army on active service amounted to 470,000 men, and the reserve to 141,000, "all old soldiers."

The Soleil tells of Queen Sophie that the Bishop of Puy has enjoined the Emperor and Empress to honour with their presence the inauguration of the colossal statue of the Virgin, to be erected on the well-known mountain in his diocese, and for which very large sums have been raised. It is said that their Majesties have accepted the invitation, and that the ceremony will take place on their return from the south.

PRUSSIA.

THE PRINCESS FREDERICK WILLIAM.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Frederick William was on Tuesday morning happily delivered of a daughter.

A telegram from Berlin on Wednesday evening states—"The health of the Princess Frederick William and the Royal infant being quite satisfactory, no bulletins have been published to-day."

THE MEETING AT TOEPLITZ.

The Emperor of Austria, accompanied by his Premier and Foreign Minister, visited the Emperor of Prussia, he according to them, first at the place of meeting, chosen by the Prince Regent of Prussia for the interview—Toeplitz, a fashionable watering-place in Bohemia, near the Saxon frontier. The little town was decked with flags, besides Austrian and Prussian ones, with those of Dresden, Saxony, and other German States.

The Prince Regent arrived at Toeplitz on Wednesday at six p.m., and was received at the station by the Emperor. His Majesty shook hands with his Royal Highness. The Emperor wore the Prussian military uniform and the decoration of the order of the Black Eagle. The Prince Regent wore the Austrian uniform and the decoration of the order of St. Stephen's.

Baron von Werther, the Prussian Ambassador at Vienna, arrived at Toeplitz at the same time as the Emperor of Austria. The Austrian Ambassadors at Berlin and Bavaria have also arrived there.

The Post says:—"We have reason to believe the current that a treaty between Austria and Prussia preceded the Conference at Toeplitz."

THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

The King of Naples has ordered the whole of Sicily to be evacuated by the Royal troops, in order to avoid a civil war, which the insurrection has commenced. The troops are being transported in steamers from Messina, Palermo, Trapani, and other Sicilian ports.

The King of Sardinia, it is stated, sent on Sunday an autograph letter to Garibaldi, requesting him not to attack the mainland; but, according to the Nazione, Garibaldi had left Genoa for Palermo, with 5000 men to make a descent on the coast of Naples, or according to another account, to the very confines of Colonel Medici, who was hard pressed by the garrison of Melazzo. It is evident, however, that nothing to be depended on is published of the General's movements.

SYRIA.

According to the latest news from Syria the state of things continued to be grave. Three French steamers were off Latakia, Saida, and Acre, in order to restrain the inhabitants, who continued to display very hostile feelings towards the Druses. Two more steamers had been sent from Beyrout to Alexandria by the Commandant of the French squadron, in order to prevent the sailing of any vessel which might produce the subscriptions opened in Egypt in favour of the Christians of Syria. At the last dates the Shadid, Ottoman screw-liner, and the Italian screw-liner Beyrout, the Austrian screw-liner Custozza, and the screw-liner Fulton, which had brought Lieutenant Pauda from Constantinople, were expected to arrive. The Ottoman squadron was under the orders of Mussadun-in-Chief of the army of the Arabistan. Foud Pacha was expected about the 20th, and the Ottoman squadron, commanded by Vice-Admiral Hussein Pacha, had received orders to quit Candia, and proceed to the coast of Syria.

It is said that the money of peace has been packed up between the Druses and Maronites. The intelligence of such a hollow proceeding will not, however, prevent the despatch of European troops. The Porte has instructed its Ambassadors at Paris and London to officially communicate to the Courts of the Tuileries and St. James's the conclusion of peace between the Druses and Maronites of the Lebanon. In this official communication the Porte, although expressing its satisfaction at the happy event, adds that it will not relax its vigilance with the utmost rigour the authors of the recent massacres; and that Foud Pacha had to that end been invested with the most ample powers, not only to punish the guilty, but to take such steps as in his opinion would prevent the recurrence of fresh conflicts between the Druses and the Maronites.

A letter from Beyrout published in the Times, professing to give some insight into the causes which have produced the present lamentable state of affairs in the Lebanon mentions the name of the Maronites. The writer, it is stated, has been settled for the last twenty years in the district, and is personally acquainted with many of the principal men which inhabit the mountain.

The French consular reports from Syria state that the massacres which have taken place are the result of a conspiracy of the Muslim fanatics. The report having spread among the Druses that European diplomacy was active away in Europe for their destruction, they determined on exterminating the Christians in Syria.

The Emperor of the French has addressed a letter to France, with the object of arresting the effusion of blood in Syria, and of protecting the Christian inhabitants, have been acknowledged by the great Powers, and that it is ready to march. The Moniteur also recognises the expediency of sending a corps-d'armée, of which France would furnish the principal part. Other troops, it is said, have been given the same opinion. The Prussian Minister for Foreign Affairs is gone to receive the orders of the Prince Regent on the subject. A Conference of the Powers will be assembled to consider and adjust of the European intervention. The acquiescence of the Porte is now only awaited.

Orders have been given for the simultaneous embarkation of troops at Marseilles, Toulon, and Algiers, and the transports which are to convey the troops to Syria have been ordered to be ready to receive them. Ten large transport steamers are completing their preparations for departure at Toulon. Two regiments from Chalons have arrived at Toulon with the General Staff. M. Ducrot, Colonel of the general staff, left Marseilles for Beyrout. The commissariat left for the same place on Sunday. The artillery division, which is said will be followed at no great interval by a second, consists of 8000 infantry, exclusive of 3000 or 4000 marines, engineers, artillery, and waggon train, in all about 13,000 men. The reserve squadron will be armed, the seamen for which are stated to be the fresh exigencies of the services.

A Dutch squadron, composed of three steam-frigates, which were anchored in Malta harbour, have just received orders to proceed immediately to Beyrout, to co-operate in the protection of the Christian population of Syria. It may be remembered that the Dutch Vice-Consul at Damascus was one of the first victims of the massacres of the 9th of July.

A committee has been formed, as will be seen in our advertising columns, in aid of the fund for money for the relief of the sufferers by the late unhappy events in Syria.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday):—

THE MEETING OF THE SOVEREIGNS.—Toeplitz, July 26.—The two Sovereigns were cheered by crowds yesterday evening. They afterwards visited, at the palace of Count Clary's palace and expressed their thanks. This morning the Prussian inhabitants were received by the Prince Regent, who, in his reply to an address presented by them, said that he intended to keep the path which he had chosen for the welfare of Prussia, Germany, and Europe. Later in the day a grand gala dinner took place at the Emperor's residence. To-day the Emperor paid a visit to the Prince Regent, which lasted one hour and a half. Count Bismarck afterwards had a long audience of the Prince Regent, which was followed by a conference between Baron von Schleinitz and Count Rechberg. The Prince of Hohenzollern remained with the Emperor a considerable time in the afternoon. Reaching being also present. The Emperor and the Prince Regent will leave Toeplitz at nine o'clock to-morrow. Count Bernstorff proceeded to Pillnitz, and the latter to Potsdam via Dresden.

SICILY.—Palermo, July 24 (via Genoa).—The engagements before Milazzo, on the 20th and 21th inst. the Neapolitan 17th inst. the Neapolitan 20th inst. with the Sicilians. After a desperate combat the Neapolitans withdrew to the citadel. The Sardinian agent, M. Depretis, arrived on the 23d inst. at Palermo. He proceeded at once to the camp. Sirtori had assumed the Dictatorship during the short absence of Garibaldi.

Naples, July 26.—The statement that the whole of Sicily had been evacuated by the Neapolitan troops is premature. Messina is still held by the Neapolitans.

SYRIA.—Marseilles, July 26.—Letters from Constantinople announce that fresh violences have been perpetrated at Aleppo, Orfa, and other places in Asia. It has again been confirmed that 25,000 French officers took part in the massacres. The Christian Cainncan of the Lebanon, his council, and some of the principal inhabitants, had signed a declaration of peace, in which they renounced all pretensions to claim for indemnity was not mentioned. After having discussed that act, they would go to Beyrout to thank Khurshid Pasha and the authorities, to confer with the chiefs of the Druses. No news, however, has yet received of the thousands of Christians who are surrounded at Kerroune.

Paris, Thursday.—It is stated that the assent of the Porte to an European intervention in Syria has been received here. Orders have likewise acceded. It is said that England will dispatch none but naval forces to Syria, and that the French Government will not soon receive orders to embark. The representatives of the five great Powers were to have signed the Convention to-day for regulating the expedition. The latest telegrams received from Constantinople that the state of things was more satisfactory. The Patrie of this evening says—"It is asserted that General Goyon will not leave Rome."

NAPLES.

"The aspect of Naples is wholly changed," says a foreign resident of that city for many years; and the revolution which has really been effected, rapidly and peacefully, is manifested in the faces of the streets with men "in whose very attitude there is an air of self-respect and independence." These are the concurrent signs in the history, which had resigned on hearing of the attack made by the troops on the people, have been assured of the Royal displeasure at that outrage, and consequently refused office.

A detachment of the Royal Guard having endeavoured to force the National Guard to carry off "Peace with the Constitution!" the latter resisted the attempt. The King has, it is stated, promised that the Royal Guard shall be immediately dissolved.

The chiefs of the Camorra assembled at Naples have ceased an illumination of the whole city to take place. Crowds of people shouted "Long live Garibaldi!" and "Long live Victor Emmanuel!" Another of the late police agents have been killed.

The Nazione of Florence states that General Ulloa, the defender of Venice in 1849, has left for Naples as Neapolitan Consul at Leghorn for a passport to return to Naples under the amnesty, has been met by a positive refusal.

UNITED STATES.

The public throughout the whole Union are fully engrossed with the arrangements for the approaching election for the presidency, satisfaction meetings of the several parties being the order of the day. President Johnson attended the ratification meeting in the Independence, the Presidential candidate of the Southern Succession Convention, and spoke strongly in favour of that gentleman's candidature. The Hon. Charles Sumner, Massachusetts, delivered a campaign speech at the Cooper Institute on the 11th, before thousands of Republicans. The excitement was considered sufficient to have been intense, had votes were given for the prospective President of the party.

The Great Eastern is still the substance of American conversation. The price of admission to see her is fixed at a dollar per person; but it has since been reduced to half a dollar for adults and to a quarter for children, and on the 4th inst. she was open in the forenoon for visitors. On the 10th inst. 6000 persons visited the ship. An excursion to sea was talked about, but nothing definite was arranged.

The Hon. Reverdy Johnson, Minister, sailed from Boston on the 7th inst.

Albert W. Hicks, the murderer of Captain Burr and crew of the oyster-sloop E. A. Johnson, suffered the extreme penalty of the law on the 13th on Bedloe's Island. Ten thousand persons surrounded the island to hear the last words of the executioner.

The New York papers give the details of a terrible double murder in that city on the 7th inst. Mr. Walton, a merchant, and Mr. J. W. Mathews, a railroad contractor. Mr. Walton was returning home at night with his cousin, Mr. Mathews, when a man came up behind and discharged a pistol at Mr. Walton's head, the shot taking effect behind the left ear. Mr. Walton fell, and soon ceased to breathe. In the meantime Mr. Mathews, in company with another person, pursued the murderer, and Mr. Mathews had got so near to him that the murderer turned round and discharged a pistol at Mr. Mathews, the ball piercing his breast. Mr. Mathews fell, exclaiming, "He has shot me!" and in the confusion produced the assassin escaped. Mr. Mathews was conveyed to the nearest drug-store, but died almost before he reached it.

A CONTINENTAL REGATTA.—At Rotterdam, a few days ago, a grand regatta took place. The principal prize was carried off by the Paris Club. The Prince of Orange and members of the Royal Family, as also most of the diplomatic body, were present, and they afterwards dined at the house of the Commodore.

A letter from Gotha states that it was decided a few days back at the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha's to erect a monument to the late Duke Ernest, father of the reigning Duke, the traveller. Baron Stanglin, of Wertemberg, will undertake the voyage. As a commission for the purchase of the necessary collection of birds, which are to be public for the fauna necessary to cover the expenses of the mission, which are estimated at 10,000 thalers.

PROTESTANTISM IN THE COLONIES.—VICTORIA.—The disparity of the sexes in the exclusively-formed colony of Victoria appears to be greater than in any other part of Australia. The last census of the colony, taken on the 31st of December, showed 88,335 unmarried men, of twenty years and upwards, to but 12,945 unmarried women of corresponding ages. The proportion of married men on the gold-fields was still greater, the bachelors being to the spinsters in the proportion of upwards of 10 to 1.

HUNGARY.—The official Wiener Zeitung publishes the following telegram, dated Pesth, July 20:—"Last evening at the conclusion of the first Hungarian drama performed in the Magyar language, a Hungarian theatre a man addressed the public in the Magyar tongue, and declared that the Emperor and King had inherited not with strong sentiments. Order was re-established at midnight. Ten individuals of the working class were arrested."

RAILWAYS IN ALGERIA.—A French Imperial decree has just been issued granting the concession for the proposed Algerian railways to M.M. Albert Rostand Jules Gautier, Eugène Lecuir, Count Branicki, William Gladstone, and Y. T. Hope. Three lines are to be built—the first from Algiers to Blidah, of which a part has been already constructed by the State; the second from Algiers to Oran; and the third from Philippeville to Constantine. The time allowed for completion is respectively one, three, and four years. The concessionaires will have to construct 600 miles, free of charge, for the completion of the three railways within the time stipulated.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

CHURCHES REOPENED.—St. Mary's, the parish church of Bridport, was consecrated on Tuesday week by the Bishop of Salisbury, having been materially enlarged and beautified, so as to place it in the first rank among the churches of the diocese.—The parish church at Kensington, Jews' colnshire, was reopened on the 19th inst., after complete restoration and great improvements. The chancel has been handsomely refitted, and contains a new Kerr of Tarbrecken, the lay impropriator, and patron of the living.—The Church of St. Andrew, Fulham, Middlesex, one of the few specimens of a perfect cruciform church in the county of Norfolk, has been restored throughout with much taste and judgment. The galleries and the pews accommodating but little unsightly western gallery has been removed; and, although much yet remains to be completed, we have no doubt that the whole arrangements of public worship, and was reopened on Friday, July 29, when two full services were celebrated.—About half a mile from the Berkeley railway station, in the Bristol and Gloucestershire Railway, under the shadow of the fir-fenced Sidcheath's Wood, stands a small but very handsome village of Stinchcombe, with its beautiful little church, which five years since was entirely rebuilt, with the exception of the tower and the south aisle, the latter remodelled, and a new chancel added. The church was reopened by full choral services. There is not a public-house or beer-shop within the parish, and the village is the property of Mrs. Dawnay, the lady of the manor.

EXETER COLLEGE.—Election Saturday, according to the Eton calendar, was to have been Saturday last, and the scholars were to have taken their departure for the election vacation on Friday (yesterday). This arrangement has, however, been altered, and the festivities of Election Saturday will not take place until the 6th inst., the next breaking-up day being Tuesday the 3rd of August, when the whole of the Eton boys, colleagues, and oppidans, are obliged to be present at the great swing match between Eton and Old Westminster will come off at Fetney on the afternoon of the same day.—The examinations for the Mathematical Prize Scholarships, the Rev. Thomas Hay, M.C., has this year been conducted by Henry Brandreth, Esq., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Examiner of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, and the Rev. Thomas Hay, M.C., has this year been conducted by Henry Brandreth, Esq., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Examiner of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, and the Rev. The Incorporated Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing Churches and Chapels held its last meeting for the present session on Monday—the Lord Bishop of Bangor in the chair. Grants of money amounting to £1,200 were made to the amount of £2,000 and grants was made exceeding by nearly £200 half the whole last year's income of the society, which is now applicable for all new cases of application, both old and urgently.

Confirmation subscriptions, amounting to nearly £90, from a numerous circle of the parishioners of all classes, have been devoted to a testimonial to the Rev. H. G. Clements, M.A., late senior Curate of Saint-month.

LITERATURE.

HEALTH RESORTS OF BRITAIN, AND HOW TO PROFIT BY THEM. By SPENCER THOMSON, M.D. Ward and Lock.

THIS has been a very exceptional year in a climatic sense. The skyey influences have been as nearly uniform as possible, and that in the way least agreeable, and with every discouragement to the enjoyment of outdoor air and exercise. Yet, as far as can be ascertained, there has been no depreciatory effect on the national health, and, on the whole, the standard of mortality has been lower and the prevalence of disease less assured than that in the last year. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the approaching season of change and relaxation will bear with it a character rather of enjoyment than of effort towards the restoration of health. Nevertheless, a book like Dr. Thomson's, not being specially addressed to the events of a single year, has a value and a use which we think will be quite appreciated. Riding far above the calibre of local guide-books, and steering equally clear of a status of purely professional, it combines the main objects of both, and is written with the knowledge and experience of a physician, and the taste and information of an observer of the beauties of creation and the technical expression of a naturalist. Most of it is the result of personal experience, gathered during the brief holidays of a medical man in active practice. As however, few have either time or opportunity to make a universal tour of England, the author has availed himself of the services of friends as well as other sources of information to give correct sketches of some of the localities. The word "sketches" expresses the design of the book, which is not set forth as a complete guide, but rather as a guide-post, pointing the way to and giving some idea of the localities most likely to afford health and pleasure to the individual seeking either or both. It is not, we are assured, intended to be the guide where serious ills call for medical judgment, and very well-considered judgment too, or to the choice of local climate, or mineral water. In such cases persons are advised to proceed secundum artem, and to place themselves under skilful medical advice. No doubt, as is here stated, the public are generally little informed on the subject in question, and it is one on which even medical men often make mistakes. It is, of course, difficult for a medical practitioner residing at a distance to be thoroughly conversant with the effects of soil, climate, and mineral water upon disease and constitution, although he may be well able to advise upon the subject generally. In the case of illness invisible and strongly recommended, whilst following the counsel of a trustworthy medical attendant, on going to a health resort for health reasons, to add to the advice which sent them from home that of some medical man of reputation resident in the locality they have been sent to. None but local practitioners can be said to be fully conversant with the requirements to be observed and the advantages to be made the best of; and it is possible that even a single consultation may make the between benefit derived and time saved, or the reverse. Dr. Thomson admits that the standard work on British climate and health resorts has yet to be written; and he says that, in the first place, it cannot be composed by one man; and secondly, it must be a compilation from succinct reports or short treatises furnished by competent authorities from each locality. Although we have dwelt thus far on what ought to be called the invalid point of view of the book, it must not be supposed that it does not contain much information and will be found by those who do not come within that category to be a pleasant and safe companion. Many a jaded man may be in perfect organic health, but requires change of scene and relaxation, and to such this book will be an excellent guide, which is often a bore, if not an anxiety—that is, for those to which he is to go, when he is about to obey that which Dr. Thomson says is a law of nature—namely, the necessity for change of place and air. The book is pleasantly written, and on account of the many in pictorial illustration, which is in itself a guide, and may be the means of influencing a decision which is halting between two opinions as to the choice of a watering-place for a visit.

ANTONIO GIUGLINI, THE GREAT TENOR SINGER.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY HERBERT WATKINS.

PEN AND PENCIL SKETCHES OF A HOLIDAY SCAMPER IN SPAIN. By A. C. ANDROS. Stanford.

ALTHOUGH, as we believe, in the last two or three years the travelling British public has shown a tendency to estimate at their proper value the capabilities of their own country to supply the charms and the excitement usually accompanying locomotion, and although the sarcastic reproach that many a cockney who is familiar with the Lake of Como never saw Cadermere has lost some of its sting, still your Englishman in considerable force is wandering over the face of the earth in search of amusement or corruption, and still the records of their adventures, or pleasures, as the case may be, come upon us with regularity from the press. Perhaps among the countries the least invaded by the roving Englishman is Spain. We often hear the wanderer to whom Jerusalem and Damascus are as household words, who can talk or prate familiarly, as the case may be, of the Himalayas or the Andes, express a wish that Spain was still unbroken ground for him. If any one meditates a trip to that not yet to the traveller fully developed equatry, we will venture to advise the perusal of Mr. Andros' little volume. It is not a pretentious book of travels, and it is written in that somewhat flippant, high-pressure style which is so prevalent among a certain class of so-called literature in the present day; nevertheless, it is a very good itinerary for any one who wishes to get through the most prominent points in Spain, is full of lively descriptions of men and things, and, above all, is profusely illustrated. The "pencil sketches" are admirably free and characteristic, and would alone form an attractive feature. As a specimen of Spanish ways and habitudes take the following sketch of a scene at Granada :—"The proprietor of the hotel having assigned me a room proceeds with great pride and conscious importance to show me the really very handsome suite of apartments lately occupied by the Prince of Wales during his stay at Granada. Boniface is so immensely proud of having been honoured by such an illustrious guest that he has adorned the walls of his establishment with coloured prints of the Royal family from the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS in memory of the great event. At breakfast I am interrupted in the calm discussion of a cup of coffee, and a bifteck à l'anglaise, by the sudden irruption of a waiter, who in broken English proclaims that a murder has been committed under the windows. Starting up, I exclaim, 'What now?' 'But now, senor!' 'It is the very error of the moon that comes more near the earth than she was wont, and makes men mad,' occurs to me as the response. But it is not an error; there is literally no mistake about it; for, rushing to the balcony, I see beneath, lying in articulo mortis, the body of a fine young fellow whose life-blood is rapidly ebbing in gory torrents from a hideous gash in the left breast. It is a sickening sight; the assassin is being dragged away, bound, by a couple of carabineros. A large crowd soon collects, but the body, weltering in a pool of gore, lies for a considerable time without any one daring to touch it. The sun is now stone dead, his glassy eyeballs glaring upwards at the sky, while the features are horribly distorted. The Alcalde at length makes his appearance, and by his orders the corpse is placed on a ladder, and borne away above the heads of the crowd, who seem to regard the tragedy as quite an ordinary occurrence. It appears that the two men had quarrelled in an adjacent posada, and, rushing out to fight, the deceased, was stabbed to the heart by his more adroit opponent before he could draw his knife. Another of the cosas de Espana. I am informed that affairs of this kind frequently happen, and that scarcely a day passes without some bloody fray taking place, for the Spaniard is as ready with his accursed navaja as the Englishman with his fist." If this little work should indeed be any of our readers into a run into Spain this autumn in search of a little of that sun of which we had so little in this country this year, perhaps they will be obliged to us for preparing them for a disenchantment by the following statement:—"The country we are now traversing is very fine; we are in the heart of far-famed Andalusia: in the course of the morning we pass through a tunnel piercing the solid rock; and wildly picturesque scenery. Lofty mountains, verdant hills, peaked eminences, and craggy defiles frown around, while figs, apricots, and pomegranates abound on every side. The peasants here are immense bucks compared with the swarthy Valencianos. These are the men we see depicted in bright colours on fruit-boxes, fans, and Academy paintings: these are the swells who sport gay jackets with many buttons, knee-breeches with gold or silver stripes, and embroidered gaiters with frosting fringe; these are the fellows who play the guitar, rattle the castanets, and caper through the bolero at the Haymarket. But where are the badvocas of whom is the bewitching donzeur of the Persa Xena school? where the nymphs who have erewhile dazzled and intoxicated me with their undulating motions and alluring postures in the glorious cachuca? Echo answers, where? I begin to suspect that the peaceful creature who enters the stage on the tip of her toes, unvelops her head, which fantastically and revelling hair is the many mantilla, luxuriates in short skirts and silk fleshings, taps her anxious lover with her quivering fan, and, finally issuing from her veil like a rosebud bursting into bloom, gives a tremendous leap into the air, and falls into the arms of her expectant amant, is in sober earnest but a sheer myth. I am told that I have come to Spain at the wrong season to see the ladies to advantage, but nothing will persuade me that any such female as the one I have described exists but in the mystic chateaux en Espagne, or in the fertile imaginations of cockney playgoers."

Among a number of productions which partake of the nature of pamphlets to which we would gladly afford notice we are anxious to mention the first number of a new quarterly magazine, edited by Llewellyn Jewitt, F.S.A., and published by John Russell Smith, entitled The Reliquary. It professes, and with good reason, to be a depository for precious relics—legendary, biographical, and historical—illustrative of the habits, customs, and pursuits of our forefathers. It contains fourteen articles, all of them relating to antiquities and curiosities, but singularly various in their character; and appended to most of them we recognise names well known among archæologists and antiquarians. There are also plates and woodcuts in due proportion to the letterpress. There is every element of success amongst the class to which it is more particularly addressed about this periodical; and at the same time it will be found interesting and suggestive to the novice and uninitiated in antiquarian lore.—A little volume entitled "The Experience of Forty Years in Turnanby," by Hugh M. Hull, Esq. (Oger and Mervyn), is the result of a suggestion to the author that his personal experience of the capabilities of that country would enable him to prepare a small pamphlet for circulation among the saddle and working classes of Great Britain from the pages of which they might glean reliable information respecting Tasmania, which he designates the Garden of the South, the Sanatorium of India, and, to a certain extent, the Granary of Australia. Mr. Hull, having filled successively the offices of police magistrate and chairman of quarter sessions for one of the counties of the colony, coroner, and clerk assistant of the House of Assembly, has, of course, enjoyed ample opportunities while he has had ample time to gather the information necessary for the compilation of his pamphlet. It is consequently very useful to the public, while the matter is put into so convenient and condensed a shape that in combination the book is a manual for those who are best on Tasmania. Moreover, the book has been just published by Davis and Allen the first part of "A New System of Tubular Geography," prepared by Mr. Frederick Boiles, Army Schoolmaster. The object is to place before students the leading facts of physical and political geography, arranged in such a manner as to systematise and facilitate the acquisition of knowledge. The tables are not intended to supersede the system of oral instruction by the master, but to assist him and his pupils in adopting a systematic course. It appears to us that they will be useful aids to schoolmasters, pupil-teachers, and persons preparing for competitive examinations. The part just published comprises Europe, Asia, and Africa, and it is intimated that should it meet with favourable reception another part will be shortly issued. We think that the next part will be expected,—even Garibaldi: an autobiography," edited by A. Dumas, and translated by W. Robson, has been opportunely brought out by Messrs. Routledge and Co. Of the early history of Garibaldi this work gives a picturesque narrative; but it has this serious defect, that it stops short midway in the hero's career, closing with the last days of the Roman Republic in July, 1849, when the banner of St. Peter floated again from the Castle of St. Angelo, and Garibaldi, with a small body of devoted adherents, quitted Rome. This blank will, doubtless, be filled up in forthcoming editions——We are informed that a little book, issued by Messrs. Ward and Lock, entitled "The Illustrated Life and Career of Garibaldi," containing full details of his conduct, daring enterprises, escapes, conquests, and reverses, is compiled from authentic documents supplied by Garibaldi himself, and that the illustrations are taken from sketches drawn on the spot by French and Italian artists attached to the different armies commanded by that General. However all this may be, is it certain that a memoir of Garibaldi is likely to meet with a favourable reception at the present moment. The narrative is brought down to the beginning of the present year, but does not go at length and in detail into the recent campaign in Sicily.—A second edition has been published of Mr. Sala's book containing an account of the "Grand Volunteer Review" (Tinsley). To the present issue has been added a full narrative of the Wimbledon target-shooting and the awarding of the prizes at the Crystal Palace. We are sincerely to be hoped that the material element in the volunteer movement which is typified by the proceedings at Wimbledon will become permanent. Some inducement has been held out by the offer on the part of her Majesty to make the prize contributed by her an annual one so long as the association exists. This example will, no doubt, be followed by the donors of other prizes; and it is stated in the little volume that Mr. Bennett, of Cheapside, has already signified his willingness to present his piece of a gold silkman's watch (value £36) at each meeting for the next five years.

GIUGLINI.

ANTONIO GIUGLINI, the great tenor, who shares with Mario the highest place on the Italian stage, is now in London, and has been for some time. He owes his musical instruction to Colini, Maestro di Capella at Fermo, and began by singing little duets between the acts at the theatre of that town. He appeared successively at the theatres of Ancona, the San Carlo at Naples, and the Scala at Milan. His success was rapid; and his reputation having reached Mr. Lumley, the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, that active and intelligent manager hastened across the Alps in order to secure an artist who promised to be a treasure. Giuglini accordingly appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre, and from time to the present has enjoyed the unbounded favour of the English public. During all this period London has been the scene of his triumphs; but he has in the intervals visited Spain, France, and Italy. He went to Madrid the season before last. While there he sang before Queen Isabella, who was charmed with his talent that she conferred upon him the cross of the order of Isabella the Catholic. In January last he left Madrid for Paris to fulfil an engagement at Milan for twelve nights at £80 sterling per night. He proceeded to Milan, but found that he was re-engaged for twelve nights more on the same terms—six for Milan and six for Turin. At La Scala he earned for twenty nights running in the "Favorita;" and even at that immense theatre it was necessary every night to refuse admission to three or four hundred people. At the time he composed a patriotic hymn, which he dedicated to King Victor Emmanuel. It was sung on the night of the grand gala in presence of his Majesty, who presented to the composer a handsome snuff-box, with his initials in diamonds. The hymn was repeated at Turin, when the chorus was sung by a large body of the principal amateurs of the city. At the beginning of our opera season Giuglini resumed his place at her Majesty's Theatre, where, as our musical readers are aware, he continues to be received with a degree of enthusiasm not only undiminished but actually increasing. His powers, especially as an actor, are evidently in a state of progressive growth, and his recent performance of Raoul in the "Huguenots" is not only his last but his greatest effort.

GARIBALDI AND HIS HEROES.

We give on the next page, from a Sketch by our Special Artist in Sicily, Portraits of some of the "Liberators of Sicily," grouped together, in their rough-and-ready uniforms, round the modern Bayard (like his prototype, without fear and without reproach), whose pride it is to have such soldiers, and soldiers who are proud to be led by such a chieftain. The antecedents of Garibaldi are too well known to require being particularised here: most of our readers doubtless know by heart the story of the whole great man, whose sword has leaped from its scabbard only for the defence of his country's freedom, or for the overthrow of tyranny and despotism in the New World as well as in the Old. Nor need we say anything here of Garci, a nonentity of whom, with a portrait, appeared in our Journal of the 14th inst. Bixio was originally a sailor, like his great commander; but when the cry to arms resounded through Italy in 1848 he hastened to join Garibaldi at Rome, and has ever since linked himself with the fortunes of his great leader. Carini, who is a Sicilian by birth, distinguished himself greatly in the last Sicilian revolution. He is one of the bravest of the brave; and, after an exile of twelve years, he has returned to his country to shed his blood in its behalf. He was wounded by some Bavarian troops in the Fiorin Vecchia, on leaving which, after the armistice had been signed. We hope to be able to give in future Numbers portraits from the same source of Medici, Cosenz, and others of the "Liberators," so as to complete the Wallhalla of Heroes, to whom a century hence history will point back as the "men of their time."

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

IT is probably to the abnormal character of the summer season that the equally abnormal character of the business of the Commons this Session is attributable. In cold, cheerless weather it is not surprising that any people should huddle together for warmth and sympathetic glow. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that members should congregate in a place where it depends on themselves to make things lively, if not exactly cheerful. In the old times, when a beefsteak in a carpetless room was all the attraction which the retiring-room of the House offered, members sought their comforts during the evening elsewhere, and they only frequented the House proper for actual business. Now every luxury that a club can afford is to be found within the precincts of the building; and on a wet, dreary night there is no better perch than the ante-rooms and library of the Palace at Westminster. The result is, that there are always relays of members who relieve each other, and keep up talk for everything. The very late sittings, too, are to be accounted for by the fact that, when every other place of resort is shut up, the House and its precincts are open, and those gentlemen who have no country residences elsewhere as long as there was any amusement going on come down in order to round off the excitement of the evening by a flush in the Chamber of the Legislature. It is common to observe in regard to any gentleman who figure in the papers as the opponents of bills between two and three o'clock, and keep the ball going by the process of moving adjournments and taking divisions, that they are away for two or three hours and reappear soon after one o'clock. It is a wonder to many therefore, that they do not take to actually recruiting their strength by the sound slumbers which the easy-chairs of the library invite and prolong, or else no stimulating their energies by a fictitious vigour by the excitement of the banquet and the ball. To them it does not matter what time they go to bed; and as new faces are always required to demand their appearance at twelve next day, why should they care about wasting the rising sun in Palace-yard for four mornings in the week? It is to be hoped that these things will sooner or the outside public for that extraordinary state of things which the reports in the daily journals disclose with regard to the business of the House of Commons, and will prevent any sympathy with the Honourable Members of the general consumption of everybody being thrown away. As to the officials of the House, and the members of the Government who are obliged to stay at the will of these legislative wanderers, why, they are in no enviable position; for it is calculated in the work of the year; and, as great work in great places is generally done, it is doubtful whether the country gains by their own satisfaction. Even the Speaker, who has to sit all night with his eyes wide open, doing nothing, and enduring all the agonies of listening, has, as far as he is supported by the general opinion of his condition as the first commoner of England and the prospect of a peerage and a pension, many thousands a year for himself and his immediate heir.

This subject leads naturally to the consideration of the period at which the Session will terminate. It is the object of every one that possible to say when that will be. The introduction of the question of the Fortifications has given rise to the consideration of a contingent resolution having been postponed until next Monday has of itself added to the gaiety of the nation. The first night's Regular debate on the Civil Service Estimates, when the lightest of the items were under discussion, if any calculation is to be formed from the appearance of things then, augurs the Session is to be of at least the length of Bartholomew's business. Altogether, unless some tremendous hot weather should turn up and the Thames become a fashionable watering-place, many gentlemen who, pretended from the enjoyment of the country amusements of the time of year, find the House as good a place of resort as any other; it is hardly possible to escape this the week which must be done can be got through in less than five weeks from the present time. It is quite evident that the postponement of party is being held together for a regular onset upon Mr. Gladstone. During the past week Mr. Disraeli has every evening, with marked significance, taken his seat immediately on the Treasury bench, and the import duty on paper is to be brought forward. On Monday evening he repeated the same thing for less than five hours. Considering that a tremendous lashing of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is promised, there is another interest in the prorogation, and one that may even have a Ministerial bias. Mr. Disraeli has not gained in the way of disposable time by the sacrificial disinterestedness of the Government in giving up a day for Mr. Locke King's motion, and how great the sacrifice must have been he alone can know—has been lost. Let it be said, in passing, that on that evening when Sir Richard Bethell gave up his hall with so much calm good humour, and good taste there was many a whispered wish that next year he may be able to introduce a bill to the effect which accompanies the introduction of a measure of legal reform from the woolsack in the House of Lords.

To descend to particulars, the most important event of the week has been the speech of Lord Palmerston in moving the vote for fortifications. There was an immense House. Conspicuous, because alone in the House, was Mr. Bright, who, in a check-coat and a white hat, and who paid the most marked and intelligent attention to all that was going on, as if he was convinced that he was the only person Commissioner attached to the French Embassy, who, to avoid any particular notice, kept himself in a suit of black and white neckties. Remarkable, and remarked upon, was the absence of Mr. Gladstone. It was suggested that he was in a huff because a matter which involved a financial arrangement was not part of his own Budget. Others said that he thereby lost an opportunity of setting forth in a speech of varied rhetorical merit the reasons for a vote which would probably have lasted an hour and a half, an operation which Lord Palmerston disposed of in three or four sentences. It was observed, too, and commented upon, that Sir Roundell Palmer came forward to defend the principle of the scheme against the criticism of those gentlemen from the City who did not see why a City Militia should not be established. Mr. Cobden was remarkable, and remarked upon, as the subject of the speech. RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.

Earl FORTESCUE put a question to the Under-secretary for War relative to the pay and allowance to Adjutants of administrative battalions of rifle volunteers in rural districts, and also as to the advisability of granting a permanent assistant, to be paid by the Government, for each company of volunteers. He thought that after what they had done during the last twelve months they were entitled to all the encouragement and assistance the Government could give them.

Lord VIVIAN said the time had arrived when the Government ought to do something for the volunteers in the shape of clothing and assistance; and, if this were done, he could guarantee that in one district he knew, where there were now 400 members, he from 1,200 to 1,500, and there, too, of the best class of men in the kingdom.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH agreed with a great deal of what had been said, because the report on the national defences had clearly shown that for the defence of the country we should have to depend more upon volunteers than upon the forts; but he thought, as there would be a difficulty in maintaining by private subscription the rifle corps as at present, it would be more magnificent in quarter sessions ought to have the power of levying a rate in the various districts for the purpose, at the expense of the landed proprietors and occupiers.

Lord HARDINGE hoped the force would receive some assistance from the Government.

Earl GRANVILLE said his great hope was that the noble rules of economy manifested themselves during the last year would not fail to be applied. He did not be had no doubt it would produce sufficient funds to maintain it efficiently. In buying a site to establish a corps more than £200 a year, however, a much greater sum could be suggested. He thought the most prudent course would be for the Government to adhere to the scheme that had been shadowed out by the Secretary of State for War.

The subject then dropped.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

At the early sitting of the House the Militia Bill was read a third time and passed; the Lisa (Ireland) Bill, and the Ecclesiastical Commission, &c. Bill, severally passed through Committee.

At the evening sitting, on the motion of Lord PALMERSTON, it was agreed that on Tuesday next, and every succeeding Tuesday until the end of the Session, the Government should have the day should have precedence of all orders of the day and notices of motions.

The Customs Duties Bill was read a third time and passed.

THE LOAN FOR FORTIFICATIONS.—Sir F. KELLY asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the event of a loan being required for the new defensible measures, it was the intention of the Government to introduce a provision in the bill to regulate the rate of charge in respect of the investment of such new securities as granted?—Lord PALMERSTON said the question would merely affect the value of the securities at the time being.

THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.—Mr. BRIGHT gave notice that on Monday next, when the vote for the militia force was proposed, he should move that on amendment to the effect that, as the House had voted £2,000,000 for the ordinary naval and military expenditure of the year, and £800,000 for the Chinese war, the consideration of the report of the Commissioners on national defences should be postponed to the future year.

THE PAPER DUTIES (CUSTOMS).—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER gave notice that on the 6th of August he should move the resolutions required to bring forward the resolution affecting the paper duties of which they had given notice.

THE SPIRIT DUTIES.—Mr. BRIGHT asked whether the Government intended that the increased duties on British spirits were to be levied on the stock in trade they were to be brought under the consideration of the House annually?—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said the matter was for the consideration of the now and required grave consideration. All he could say at present was that the bill as it stood would be considered distinct permanent.

THE GOVERNMENT OF NAPLES AND GARIBALDI.

Mr. GREGORY asked the Secretary of state for Foreign Affairs whether any proposition had been made to her Majesty's Government by the Special Envoy of the Neapolitan Government, lately arrived from that city, for the establishment of friendly relations with the other Powers in imposing and enforcing by the means at whose disposal it was the principal object of the Neapolitan Government to overthrow their communication with the Government under Garibaldi, and whether her Majesty's Government had taken any steps for ascertaining any wishes on the part of the Government of Russia, and the Special Envoy of the Neapolitan Government.—Lord J. RUSSELL said the Duke of Sandalia had arrived in this country and informed met to make any decent upon that portion of the dominions of the King of the Two Sicilies which were under the control of Garibaldi, and that they had also proposed that her Majesty's Government should interpose for the sake of the peace of Naples and Europe. He could only say that the latter should not attempt to attack the territories of the friendly King of the Two Sicilies, and that the Government, and that the Government of France should use force to compel Garibaldi to comply with the demand. He thought that they would have reason to listen to the terms at first proposed, but those he had just mentioned they at once refused to accede to.

EUROPEAN FORCES (INDIA) BILL.

On the order of the day for going into Committee on the European Forces (India) Bill, Mr. HENNESSY moved a resolution to the effect that it would be advisable to introduce a clause into the bill of such a character as to enable the officers among the officers in the army of India should be admitted to the Queen's first proposals, but those he had just mentioned they at once refused to accede to.

A long discussion ensued, which was closed by a majority of 77 to 15.

The discussion of the main question occupied the remainder of the evening.

Mr. Tite, M.P., who, for his gratuitous architectural services to St. Thomas's Hospital, was, some time since, elected a life-governor, has endowed that institution with £100, the interest to form a yearly gratuity for one of the students, tenable for three years.

THE LAST OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.—A portion on the estate of Mr. Glass, at Valentia Bay, Ormondsland, has been made by Mr. Varley and Captain Kell, the gentlemen deputed by the Atlantic Telegraph Company to recover the two cables. The cable, which is the last of the three only about seven miles of the cable having been raised, and this consisting of a number of pieces of the cable was in a very bad state, and the men who above gentlemen attribute to the rocky character of the bottom. After making a great deal of progress the two officers were compelled to abandon the attempt.

CHEVALIER'S PATENT SELF-RECORDING TARGET.—We have received a letter from Mr. Alexander Chevalier begging to make known the result of Professor Wheatstone's Universal and Military Telegraph to the purpose of target-practice, which has been adopted and is now in operation by the 1st Middlesex and the South Middlesex Volunteers at Wolham-green. Lond. Lord Elcho and Colonel Dunne visited the scene of action on the occasion of the last meeting, and at Wolham-green and elsewhere; and his claim is substantiated by others who have had occasion to try it. The invention, he believes, has been fully tested and highly approved by General Hay, Sir F. Lane, Inspector-General of Fortifications, Major-General Sir Richard Dacres, Colonel Gray, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Hughes, and many others. Annexed is a brief account of some of the principal features of Chevalier's Self-recording Target:—"The object of the invention is to obtain an extremely simple and efficient instrument it is:—" The target to be fired at is divided into a central division, or bull-eye, and any convenient number of concentric parts. At one side of the target, or at any convenient distance, the signal-board is set up, the face of which is divided into the same number of concentric parts. Each of the divisions of the target is connected by the usual signal-board are connected by means of wires with electric connecting-wire, with a corresponding number of wires upon the signal-board, as usual. Each part of the target is in a state of insulation from the galvanic battery until struck by a shot, when immediately a "circuit," or electric connection, is made, and a current of electricity traverses the wire corresponding with that division or part, and it immediately causes a signal-needle, or pointer, upon the division or corresponding part, to deflect or vibrate to the extent of the blow. Thus, the necessity of markers or signal-men is entirely obviated, and the individual firing sees by merely glancing at the indicator, which part of the target he has hit, and this enables him at once to correct any defect in his aim; and the register of the hits will be most faithfully and accurately recorded." One of the gentlemen who has written to us on this subject says: "The invention of Lieutenant Chevalier has only to be seen by any one of the least discernment to enable him at once to appreciate its wonderful simplicity, and the instantaneous manner in which each shot striking the target is recorded."

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE closes this evening. The season has been prolonged by the run of "Oberon," which has been so unexpectedly great that Mr. Smith found it expedient to engage Mdlle. Albeni and to recall Mongini by express after he had taken his departure for Italy. Mdlle. Ismaelskaia has also been with us, and has succeeded in its Italian version than it ever was in its original form; and it is only doing justice to Mr. Smith to say that this result has been mainly owing to the engaging musical and archæological correctness with which the spectacle has been got up, and the exquisite performance of Weber's accompaniments. Mr. Smith is going to give English opera next season; and, if he give "Oberon" in its primitive form, as it came from the hands of its composer, with the dialogue, recitatives, and not rendered tedious by sing-song recitative; with the music cleared of the interpolations with which it has been loaded, and with the fine scenery, both intellectual and decoration as at present, we have no doubt that the opera will be even more successful than it has yet been. Mr. Smith has, we understand, it may add that, as Mr. Smith is to have Titiens and Sims Reeves, the two principal parts are well provided for.

The Royal ITALIAN OPERA, we gather from the advertisements, will close next Saturday.

Mr. G. W. MARTIN's concert of prize glees, part-songs, and other pieces of vocal music, which took place at Exeter Hall on Friday evening last week, was a highly interesting entertainment. It was given in consequence of the success of Mr. Martin's previous concert of the kind, and the hall was again crowded to excess, many persons being unable to gain admission. The sole vocalists were Mr. Sims Reeves and eight gentlemen selected from the choirs of the Chapels Royal, St. Paul's Cathedral, and Westminster Abbey; and the chorus was a thousand strong. The programme was of the most varied character, and included pieces composed by Mr. Martin. The new national part-song, "Defence, not Defiance," was sung for the first time, and vehemently encored. The other pieces by Mr. Martin were "Hurrah, Boys!" "The Volunteer Cheer! March," and the prize glee, "All hail, thou Queen of Love." The last-mentioned was encored, but the encore demand was declined and the next piece attempted, but the audience would insist upon "All hail" being sung over again. All the part-songs and glees were encored. The glees were sung in the most finished and wonderful power and effect, the gradations of light and shade being most delicately observed. Among the most effective pieces were Macfarren's "The Last Rose of Summer," which was rapturously encored; and the same marks of approbation were bestowed on Mr. Land's "Merry Dragon." A glee by Mr. Benedict, "Hail, Smiling Morn," was loudly cheered on quitting the orchestra. He is certainly entitled, from the number, the character, and the excellence of his productions, to be considered the first glee composer of the day.

A concert is to take place on Friday next at the NATIONAL SCHOOL-ROOMS, Bethnal-green, for the benefit of the Bethnal Green funds. It is got up by the Rev. J. D. Frost, the Incumbent of St. Paul's, Wilmer-dale, and the Rev. Mr. Bethell, the Incumbent of National Schools—a body of influential gentlemen of the neighbourhood who interest themselves strongly in the prosperity of the most valuable institutions of the district. As its benefit object the performance will be highly attractive, the programme exhibiting a combination of the most popular talent of the day, vocal and instrumental. Thereto it includes the names of Miss Parepa, Mdme. Louisa Vinning, Miss Palmer, Mr. Patey, M. Depret, Mr. Scotson Clarke, and Mr. and Mdme. R. S. Pratten; all of whom have kindly tendered their gratuitous services.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE RELIEF OF FOREIGN MUSICIANS, a very praiseworthy association, which has existed since the year 1822, gave a concert at the Royal Surrey Gardens on Monday last for the purpose of establishing a fund for the relief of the widows and children of deceased members. The programme contained the names of many of our most eminent vocal performers, including Mdme. Rudersdorff, Mdme. Weiss, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, the Misses Broughton, Miss Jeffreys, and the young lady whose highly successful debut, as noticed on Saturday last, took place at the Crystal Palace concerts. It is known that this lady is an Englishwoman, a member of a distinguished musical family, to whose name she would do honour, while it would certainly add to her own.

The last of MASTER ALLISON's series of three pianoforte performances took place on Wednesday evening at Willis's Rooms. These performances have had the effect of making the talents and attainments of the young pianist more favourably known to the musical world. He was assisted on the occasion by Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. W. H. Holmes, and gives very promise of high distinction in his art.

THE THEATRES.

STRAND.—Miss Rosina Wright has surprised the audience of this house by the assumption of a dramatic character—that of the "Rough Diamond"—on the occasion of her benefit. The clamorous acquitted herself admirably. The character, standing with many others, though, perhaps, a little deficient in breadth. Messrs. Montagu Williams and F. C. Burnand have also given to their popular pieces, now called "The Volunteer Ball." The plot turns on the old trope of mistaken jealousy; nevertheless, the situations are novel, and the art of making the Joes and Bobs into humorous characters is striking. Mr. J. Clarke looks very absurd in his Highland costume as dressed for the ball supper, and Mr. Paul Bedford, as the cook, is admirably ballied by Mr. James Bland, as a big Major, with a big voice, and a most determined air of defiance.

PRINCESS'S.—The performance of Mr. Phelps having terminated, the manager experimented a decided novelty on Monday. The Zouave artists and founders of the theatre in Athenæum, Peterborough-row, access (say the bills) to see the performance of Mr. Phelps, and before the allied armies gained such renown," then made their appearance on those boards, in true military costume which they had acted in during the circumstances alluded to. These little dramas, which are, indeed, so slight in plot that it would be absurd to attempt any, are full of fun and humour. "Mistress and Maid" and "The Cordé Sensible." In the first there are a young Russian maiden, impersonated by the Zouave Corporal, and a Zouave Sergeant, impersonated by Mr. Phelps, whose sustainment of the female characteristics is equal to that of Mr. Woodin. The Zouave Frederick, with his drum, belittles the Sergeant, in the cook's character. The latter piece is blended with an incident at Inkerman—the actual breaking in on the ideal by a sudden attack of the Russians, in which the Zouaves, both military and civilian, are seen doing manly service in the field. We are obliged to Mr. Harris for enabling us to see the Zouaves in their own costume, and allow amused themselves while thus bravely engaged vindicating the balance of European power. Those who suppose that these Zouaves are mere actors in the field of Mars, and that their military duties are merely extravagance, will be disappointed. These Zouaves are real artists as well as soldiers, and are to be seen at their best.

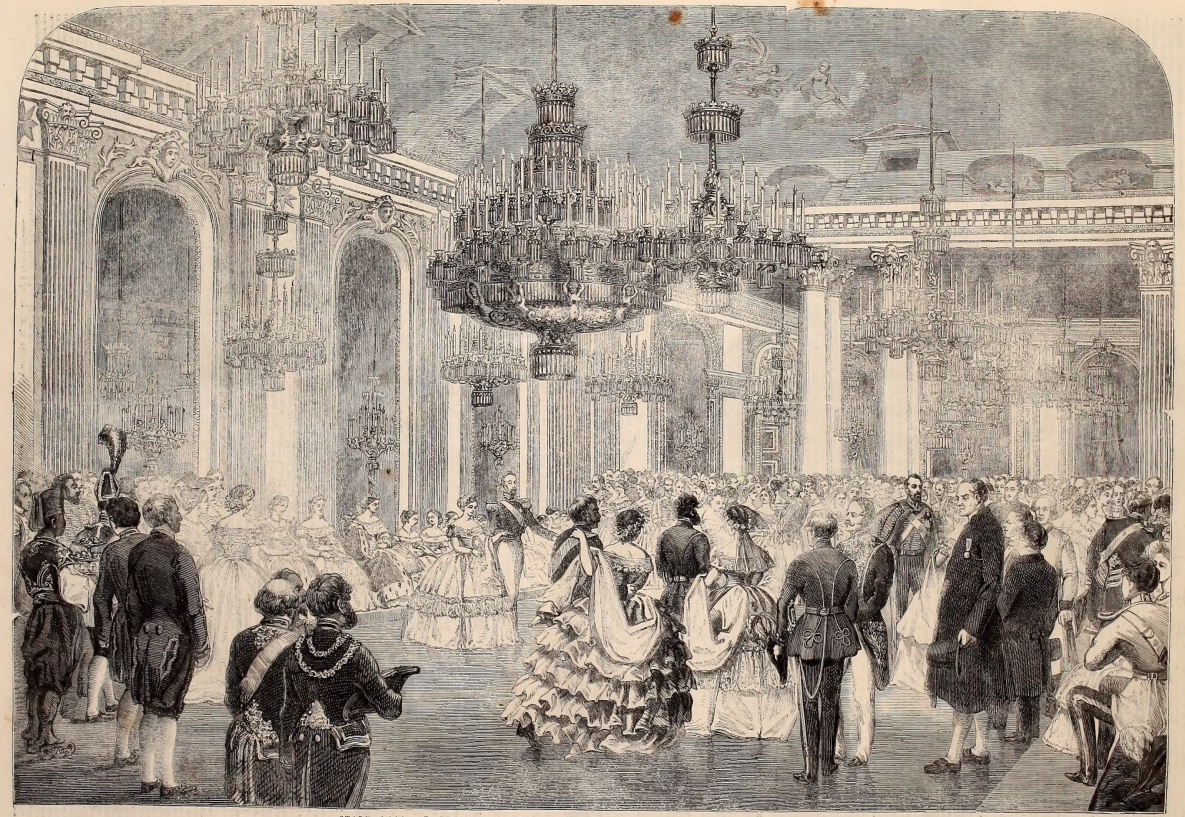
ST. JAMES'S.—The well-known drama of "Les Demoiselles de St. Cyr," by M. Alexandre Dumas, has met with the greatest success under Mr. Compton's management. The character, both intellectual and moral, of the talents of Mdlle. Delphine Fix, who supported the lively part of Louise Mercklein, but the high order of her dramatic powers, it will of Louise Mercklein, but the high order of her dramatic powers, it will of course be believed, were admirably represented. We must mention with particular respect Mdme. Thomasse as Charlotte de Mervan, and M. Fix as Jean, in the difficult character of which he gave a touch of pathos that must M. Bout, as Bobinsky, he passed by with contempt. The audience manifested the most unequivocal delight in appreciating both the merits of the dialogue and of the performers.

DRURY LANE.—On Wednesday evening a performance took place for the benefit of the late Mr. Robert B. Brough's family, on which occasion many professional actors gave their gratuitous services. The burlesque of "The Enchanted Island" was also performed, but chiefly by amateurs. An opportunity was taken of producing Miss Fanny Stirling, who made her first appearance as Miranda, and justified to the full her mother's discipline. We have seldom seen a début so promising. In the course of the evening Mr. G. A. Sala pronounced an eloquent address written by himself; and Mrs. Brough delivered a new prologue to the burlesque, written by Mr. Shirley Brooks. The result of the united efforts thus made was, we understand, satisfactory.

ALHAMBRA.—The equestrian performances of this establishment is marked by more than extraordinary characteristics, and is under the direction of Mr. Van Hare, who displays a laudable ambition in his management. The performances begin with the Eastern Rifle Practice, by Aron Hassein, an Arab chief, in his Tour de Force—a graceful exhibition. Then Mdlle. Fanny Monette manages a steed with wonderful address and tact. Mdlle. Josephine appears as Diana, the Goddess of the Chase. All these are very elegant performances. We were also gratified by a variety of songs sung by Mr. Tom Matthews. The burlesque fight, in caricature of Sayers and the Benicia Boy, was cleverly and adroitly gone through by Mr. Cousins and Harry Crowther. The latter article was acted as Clown to M. Leigh in his bare-back trick act. But the great feat of the circus is that performed by the Brothers Smith, who execute a variety of strange, and, some terrible somersaults, and what are truly called in the bills gymnastic marvels. The Arabs of the Desert, also give variety to the entertainments with their well-known balancings, and the whole concludes with some comic vocal scenes, more or less beautiful in themselves, and furnishing an harmonious termination to the entertainment.

An extra performance will be given this (Saturday) evening by Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul and Mr. Murray in all of the widow and children of the late R. B. Brough.

METROPOLITAN NEWS



BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 809 boys and 827 girls—in all 1,636 children—were registered in London. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1859-59 the average was 1,536.—In the week the number of deaths was 1,036, and the number of deaths in London was 976. For the corresponding weeks of the ten years 1850-59 the average number of deaths was 1,017. Last week's number is, consequently, to be 1126. The result of the comparison is satisfactory; for the actual number of deaths in last week was 140 less than the estimated number.

Two German sugarbakers, named Schawsh and Ludwig, employed in a refinery in Whitechapel, London, came to blows last Saturday afternoon, and a struggle ensued in the course of which Ludwig received possession of a large broom handle. They then commenced a regular savage affray, and in the course of the fight one of the men, it is said, by blows received a severe blow on the base of the skull, and dropped suddenly to the ground. The men were separated by their fellow-workmen, and when the skull bone were pressing upon the brain. These were carefully removed, but no hopes are given of the recovery of the injured man.—Morning Advertiser.

PROPOSED CIRCULAR RAILWAY ROUND LONDON.—"ASSAM Rifle" writes:—"Having seen a plan of a proposed railway round London, forming a complete cordon round it, at an average distance of fifteen miles from its centre, and having carefully examined its statistical information, I," Such a railway, with its electric telegraph, would permit an overwhelming number of men and guns to be concentrated at any point desired in the extremely short space of time." 2." During peace such a railway would be available for pleasure excursions, for the conveyance of troops to reviews, and overcrowded streets would be relieved of much of their carriage traffic.

THE SEPTENNIAL CONGRESS.—The concluding meeting of the International Congress was held last Saturday, when the resolutions in reference to the reverting reports were brought up from the various sections. In the course of the proceedings the Congress were very thoroughly entertained by the papers addressed to him by Miss Nightingale. This lady suggested that, at the next Congress, the delegates should present statistical returns relative to the diminution of mortality and disease consequent upon the carrying-out of sanitary improvements in the several localities represented. Much information might be derived that would prove extremely useful to the cause of social reform. Dean Ramsay (Edinburgh) presided in the absence of Lord Shaftesbury (Wales). Dr. Delaney, and several other delegates, expressed their acknowledgments for the kind reception they had met with in London, and on the motion of thanks to Lord Brougham, the presidents of the sections, the authorities of King's College, and the Lord Mayor, the meeting broke up. The next Congress dissolved, and hoped to meet many of those present at the 80 Congress (Congress) in 1867. Copies of the papers read at the 1860 Congress would be laid at Berlin. The meeting separated with three cheers for the Queen, three for the Prince Consort, and three for the Prince of Wales, upon there was a declarer at the Crystal Palace, at which all the foreign and colonial delegates were present. Lord Brougham, Lord Shaftesbury, Dean Ramsay, and the convivial gathering was graced by the presence of the Countess Granville and a number of ladies.

THE AGAPEMONE CASE.—NOTTIDGE v. PRINCE.—This extraordinary case, which occupied five days in opening, was resumed before Vice-Chancellor Wood on Wednesday morning. The bill was instituted by Mr. Ralph Cook Nottidge, who died on July 31, 1859, and the defendants are Henry Prince, the founder of the Agapemone, and other unmarried and interests, among the Cook Nottidge was a trustee for the benefit the principal defendant, Henry Prince. The object of the bill was to the persons entitled under the testator's will, which were transferred by an act of 27th Vic. to the Court of Chancery, and also under the Court of Chancery, and also under the Court of Chancery, and also under

PARIS FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.

THE chronicles of the fashions of 1860, owing to the exceptional summer season through which we are passing, are likely to prove as monotonous to our fair readers as to ourselves. Alas! where are the light, fairy-like toilets we were wont to reproduce for the months of July and August? Of a truth, we are afraid we shall not see them this year; for hitherto we have only the continuation of the spring costumes, slightly varied as to form, but with little alteration as to material, except by a few of the brave who defy the approach of lumbago and bronchitis, the stripes inflicted on many of the too daring. By the way, this allusion reminds us that striped dresses are much in vogue of late, no longer the old style of horizontal stripes, but almost universally perpendicular ones, which produce a pleasing effect on dresses with flounces, as they thus blend more gracefully with the ensemble of the robe. Bonnets are just now less pretentious in their decoration; fewer flowers are worn, and those somewhat negligently; there is, above all, a diminution in the amount of the gilt ornaments to which we have frequently alluded, and they seem likely to give way to another mode just come in fashion: we mean imitations of precious stones, which will afford a wider range for the display of taste, and have a somewhat less appearance of tinsel. We may, therefore, expect shortly to have to describe the imitations of some of the most celebrated diamonds, opals, rubies, pearls, &c., which, if well executed, will throw much light around the heads of the ladies, but will, we are afraid, add materially to the weight and to the cost of their chapeaux. We really think that Benedict and Co. ought to make a demonstration against these continuous efforts to assault their purses, and try to convince their better halves that imitated precious stones will only injure the naturally much superior effect produced by themselves, who are the real jewels of the creation.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—This is a silk dress trimmed with lace placed flat upon the stuff. The mantelet-pelisse is cut square in front, and is composed of two rows of Chantilly lace. The bonnet may either be of straw or crape, ornamented behind by a lace fanchon surmounted by a small bouquet of flowers. The tour-de-tête consists of tufts of small flowers interminged with black velvet bows.

Fig. 2. Visiting Dress.—Robe of grenadine gauze, with seven narrow flounces, the upper one surmounted by a frilling corresponding with the trimming on the sleeves, which are wide, and furnished with three rows of frills, as well as the jockey. The dress is round-waisted, and attached with a Moldavian band and buckle. The bonnet is of rice-chip, trimmed with a wide blonde forming a flat bow, of which one end falls over the side and rests upon the curtain. The cap is made up of blonde, two small bouquets of roses, and foreign green grapes.

Fig. 3. Seaside Costume.—Plain silk robe, simple and without pretension as to façon. Casaque of black silk, with gimp pelerine, the latter relieved by three black velvet roses and buttons down the front: these throw out agreeably the narrow, plain white linen collar. There is a row of buttons down the front of the skirt of the casaque, of which the sleeves are ample, and open at the ends, with the facility of buttoning them if desired. Straw hat bordered with black velvet; puff of black velvet in the middle; bunch of white cocks' feathers. The net for the back hair is of black chenille.

STATE BALL AT STOCKHOLM.

THE King of Sweden was crowned as King of Norway on the 20th inst., at Drontheim, with great solemnity. Of the coronation ceremony at Stockholm, which took place a few weeks ago, we gave at the time several Engravings from sketches by our Special Artist, Mr. Fitzcokes, also Portraits of the King and Queen of Sweden and Norway, and of several members of the Royal family, from photographs taken by Mr. Hansen, of Stockholm, the Court photographer. One or two Illustrations in connection with this great national event we have hitherto been prevented, by a pressure of other matters, from publishing, and one of these, "The State Ball at Stockholm," we give on the preceding page.

On the Tuesday following the coronation ceremony a ball was given by their Majesties in the state apartments of the Palace at Stockholm, to which our Artist had the honour of being invited. The long suite of handsomely-decorated rooms were filled to overflowing with the élite of the society which had assembled to do honour to their Sovereign on the occasion of his coronation. The brilliant assemblage of uniforms, added to the galaxy of beauty, formed a coup d'œil rarely surpassed. We give an Engraving of the "Grand Salle des Fêtes," where dancing was carried on with great spirit in the presence of the Royal entertainers. The tall personage, with his hat in his hand and in his ordinary dress, is the deputy from Dalecarlia, each province of the empire being represented in this manner by a deputy, who, in addressing his Majesty, used "thee" and "thou" as a Quaker would do in England. Behind the Dalecarlian are the Norwegian and one or two other deputies. To the left of the picture will be seen a negro in Eastern costume, and a man in a very peculiar dress with a high plume of feathers in his hat, whose duty was to be in constant attendance on the Royal party with refreshments. The Queen and Princesses were seated, attended by their Ladies in Waiting, on a slightly-raised dais which skirted the side of the room. The King was dressed in hussar uniform, and Prince Oscar in naval uniform. Dancing continued till about one o'clock in the morning, when a supper terminated the festivities.

COUNT GYLDENSTOLPE, GRAND MARSHAL OF SWEDEN.

THE VOLUNTEER SHAM FIGHT.

OUR last Number contained an account of the miniature battle fought by volunteers on Saturday week at Camden Park, Kent. We give, however, a few additional particulars in connection with the two Engravings of the fight on pages 78 and 79. Lord Ranelagh was the prime mover of the affair, which came off very successfully. Near the Southborough station was the appointed scene of operations—a valley, one slope of which was fringed by Bickley Wood, and the other bounded by one of the little Kentish hills; a limekiln, a stream running through at the bottom of the valley, and a road cutting it obliquely at one end, completed a miniature field well with all the necessary strategical positions. Over the stream was constructed a temporary bridge, which, at the proper stage of the proceedings, blew up with a loud report, the explosion sending planks into the air in all directions, to the imminent danger, apparently, of the retreating South Middlesex Engineers. The troops were divided into two divisions—1st or Defending Division, under Lieut.-Col. Hicks; 2nd or Attacking Division, under Lieut.-Col. Viscount Ranelagh. The latter division was divided into two brigades—1st Brigade, Lieut.-Col. Lord Radstock; 2nd Brigade, Lieut.-Col. Thorold. Acting Quartermaster-General, Lieut.-Col. Hon. C. H. Lindsay.

Camden Park is admirably adapted for a sham fight, so far, at least, as the spectators are concerned. In every direction it is broken up by swelling mounds and winding valleys, relieved on all sides by masses of dark luxuriant foliage. To the west lies another park, with similar features; while to the north-west the landscape opens out and discloses in the far distance the fairy Sydenham Palace on the horizon line. The sky, which during the afternoon had been leaden and threatening, relieved by fitful sunshine, now became clear and tranquil, and the soft July twilight stole over the scene, resting upon the thick woods and the emerald slopes, and filling the very air with that loveliness and calm which are invariably associated with the glories of declining day.

The action commenced at seven o'clock—much later than announced—owing, not to the tardiness of the corps, but to the extreme slowness of the railway. The effect, however, was perhaps the finer in the end, as it was dusk before the firing was over. The company of engineers of the City Brigade, under Captain M'Leod, conspicuous by their red uniform, appeared on the right of the defended position, and, advancing, lined the edge of the wood, through which the enemy was approaching. The Engineers opened fire on them, and it was returned from the wood. A light, dropping fire continued for a few moments, then the Engineers fell back in skirmishing order on the open field, loading and firing rapidly. They were followed up by the enemy's skirmishers, who were also soon on the clear ground. When they had nearly driven their opponents to the stream in the centre of the vale, the main body of the attack suddenly issued from the wood, formed in line, advanced, and fired a volley. The skirmishers of the defence crossed the stream rapidly, and the attacking line pressed forward, keeping up a quick fire. As the wood from which they had issued here makes a bend the ground was not wide enough for the whole line. In the centre it was four deep. This first appearance and advance of the attacking force was one of the best portions of the spectacle, particularly the dash out of the wood, which had concealed their forward movement by its leafy screen. On the other side, while the skirmishers were retreating, the main body of the defence had been forming on the level to the right of the linchlins, their front defended by the little stream. Pressed still more sharply by the advance of the attacking line, the defence made a stand in the cover of the linchlins. The fight was hearty on both sides, volley following volley in quick succession; but the position soon became untenable. Part of the attacking line crossed the stream, and took its brave defenders on the right flank; whilst the centre, in superior numbers, nothing could be done but retire. The defence drew out of the cover and the chase-play all formed on the slope of the hill. The summit of which was crowned by a redoubt. They were followed up by the left wing of the attack, the right wing keeping in the valley, in a line parallel to the centre, thereby securing on its retiring fox, and keeping up a heavy fire on his front and flank. The defence again retired up the hill, and formed in square. The attack, which had hitherto been made in line, was now made in two columns; but in this form was repulsed by the hoop fire of the centre and rear faces of the columns stopped, turned, and descended the hill at the double, partially disordered. It looked so much like real running and real disappointment, but were themselves discomfited by the burst of laughter that told them the true state of the case. They then formed again, and marched off, and returned to the charge, this time successfully, for repulse is not always defeat. The defending line broke, and retired to their last position, the first field-day on which the several corps had been out for such practice together, the attention was very creditable to all; but no doubt if any regiments of the line, to soon after their first drill, would have acquitted themselves so well.

General Brown was followed by the Commander-in-Chief to act as inspecting officer on the part of the War Office, and has made, it is said, a very favourable report.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Goodwood Meeting, with only £835 of added money (a great portion of which is derived from deductions and entrance fees), did not open very auspiciously. On the 16th, the weather was bad, and the Stewards' Cup, were small and weak. After running a dead heat for the Levant Stakes with Mr. Merry's Dalston colt, Wallace (9st. extra) walked over. On the following Wednesday, the winner of the One Thousand, who does not enjoy anything beyond a mile, had no chance, and Mr. Merry's Dalston Stakes with Wallace, who gave him 11lb.; but the dashing, odd-lined Sweetmeat made up the disappointment to Scott's stable by beating thirty in a canter for the Rewards' Cup. On the Thursday, a remarkable broad-backed white strip was seen in the front at the Ham finish with his Voltigeur filly, Wednesday was the favourite, notwithstanding Stockwell's sport ever known at Goodwood since it became a four days' meeting. Buccaneer, with 3 to 1 on him, made short work of the rest. The Drawing-room Stakes was a little liked by his St. Leger backers; and Wallace, who showed himself in such form at Stamford last week, had to give way for the Goodwood colt, to which Satellite, the favourite, gave him 13lb. for his year. Lewes, which has produced the winners of so many of our best cups, is the annually attempt which has been made to crush it, opens the Brighton race-week, with a very nice programme, on Monday and Tuesday, and the Brighton Review take up the running for three days more. Downham Market meeting is held on Wednesday, and Wolverhampton on Thursday and Saturday.

Although the match between the two Elevens resulted in a draw it was a very hollow affair, and the United had 193 to get, and only Griffith, Lockyer, and Box got in, when the stumps were thrown at the end of the third day's play. Grundy was in good form in his bowling; and Mynn, generally a failure in this ground, and made 26 and 44, while Wisker accomplished 53. We have seldom seen Hewitt make more and 28 and 67 were very well. Fortune has gone completely against the United this year; and, although they had seven or seven-and-twenty runs given to them, quite overpowered from the first. The first eleven of England did not meet the fourteen at Lord's, owing to the bad weather, till Tuesday, and at the end of the first innings they had a lead of two. Parr did not play, but Hayward, whose wicket is gradually becoming unpreparable to bowlers, batted very carefully, and so did Carpenter. The fielding of the latter, as well as that of Mr. V. E. Walker and Willsher, was also very good; and Jackson was in form with his bowling. Only 60 runs to get in fourteen was not to the mark; but Hearne, Daft, and Tinley made good scores; and the Hon. and Reverend Mr. Haygarth, who nearly tried the patience of bowler after bowler. The match came to an unexpectedly summary conclusion on Wednesday, many thought through bowling of Willsher for the fourteen, who thus won the match by eight wickets. We give the result below. On Monday the M.C.C. and Ground play nine Hampstead players with two players of their own, and on the same day Surrey encounters the North of England at the Oval. On the following day Cambridge meets the Staffordshire at Stourbridge; the United play Mr. John Walker's Sixteen at Southgate; and the Gentlemen of Sussex play a return match with the Gentlemen of Kent at Brighton.

The water fixtures are as follows:—On Monday, Hammersmith, Swansea, and Thames Sailing Club Regattas; on Tuesday the Royal Yacht Squadron sail for his Royal Highness the Prince Consort's cup; and Wednesday inaugurates August with the struggle for Dogett's coat and badge. On Thursday her Majesty's Plate will be sailed for by the Royal Squadron, and the Norfolk and Suffolk Yacht Club hold their regatta at Oulton. On Friday, Ramsgate and Royal Southampton Yacht Club and the Royal York Regattas, and the Ilion and Westminster eight-oared race from Putney to Chiswick; and the Shepperton and Hailsham Regattas close the Saturday.

CRICKET.—The All England Eleven against the United All England Eleven : At Kennington Oval on Saturday (the third day) this match was again resumed, but owing to the rain it was not one o'clock before the game commenced. Time could not permit of the game being played out, and it was consequently left drawn, All England evidently having the best of it, as the Eleven scored with three :—England, first innings, 146 ; second innings, 221. United, first innings, 124 ; second innings, 193.

The First Eleven v. the Next Fourteen of England : This match was brought to a conclusion on the 16th inst., on Lord's, in favour of the larger number by eight wickets, the score being as follows:—Eleven, 1st innings, 139 ; 2nd innings, 97. Fourteen, 1st innings, 128 ; 2nd innings, 60 ; with loss of five wickets.

AQUATICS.—The Grand National Regatta : This great regatta was concluded on Saturday. The following are the results :—In Appointed Class (Thames), 1st, £8, and 4l. Won by Shark Rowing Club, with 2nd, Ariel, 3rd, Zephyr. In Open

THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

ALL accounts concur in stating that the preparations made in the cities and towns of Canada for the reception of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales (who at this time is, doubtless, enjoying their loyal hospitality) are of great magnificence—on a scale, says our account, never before attempted in that or in any other colony. A correspondent of the Morning Post writes from Quebec on the 9th inst. as follows:—"There will be much of novelty in all that the Royal party will witness, which cannot fail to interest and please, not only as respects the glorious and fine character of the natural attractions of the country, but in the peculiar style of the decorations adopted by Canadians, and in displays of a more holiday character in Europe. For instance, the lumberers in the Ottawa country intend to welcome the Prince in a characteristic manner. They propose to man a hundred canoes, each crew in uniform, and with banners flying at the sterns. The largest canoe will be for the Prince, and, thus escorted, they will convey him down the rapids of Lake Deschenes and back again. No doubt, the Indians of Caughnawaga, near Montreal, will, in their peculiar costume, and singing the songs they have been accustomed to chant when paddling on the Hudson's Bay canoes on the route between Lake Superior and Red River, form part of the water procession which is intended to be got up to meet the Royal visitor on his upward voyage to Montreal. And in this neighbourhood also there is a well-known tribe of Indians, descendants of the warlike Iroquois, who, decked out in all the finery they have at command, will form a picturesque feature in the procession which will meet his Royal Highness and attend his progress through the most remote streets of this city. Everywhere something novel, though the same in characteristic outline, will arrest the attention of the Prince; and, while we may fail to make a splendid appearance, we shall certainly make such a display as will befit the circumstances of the province."

The following correspondence between the President of the United States and Queen Victoria relative to the visit of the Prince of Wales to the United States has been published in the New York papers:—

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT TO THE QUEEN.

Washington, June 4, 1860.

To her Majesty Queen Victoria.—I have learned from public journals that the Prince of Wales is about to visit your Majesty's North American dominions. Should it be the intention of his Royal Highness to extend his visit to the United States I need not say how happy I should be to give him a cordial welcome to Washington. You may be well assured that whatever in this country he will be greeted by the American people in such a manner as cannot fail to prove gratifying to your Majesty. In this they will manifest their deep sense of your domestic virtues as well as their convictions of your merits as a wise, patriotic, and constitutional Sovereign.

Your Majesty's most obedient servant,

JAMES BUCHANAN.

HER MAJESTY'S REPLY.

Buckingham Palace, June 22, 1860.

My Good Friend,—I have been much gratified at the feeling which prompted you to write to me, inviting the Prince of Wales to come to Washington. His intends to arrive from Canada through the United States, and it will give him great pleasure to have an opportunity of testifying to you in person that those feelings are fully reciprocated by him. He will be also, at the same time, to thank the respect which he entertains for the chief magistrate of a great and friendly nation and kindred nation.

The Prince of Wales will drop all Royal state on leaving my dominions, and travel under the name of Lord Renfrew, as he does when he visits Ireland as the Count of Europe.

The Prince Albert wishes to be kindly remembered to you.

I remain, ever your good friend,

VICTORIA R.

The New York papers publish also a letter from Lord John Russell in reply to the Mayor of New York's invitation to the Prince of Wales to visit that city. His Lordship's letter thus concludes:—"I am directed to request Mr. Dallas will communicate to his Excellency Fernando Wood the expression of the satisfaction felt by the Prince of Wales upon receiving the resolution of the municipality of New York, and of his hope that towards the latter end of September he may be enabled to pay a visit to the city they represent, and to the mercantile community have given him so welcome a reception in 1841 and their friendly regard." The New York Herald of the 14th decrees a leader on the subject of the Prince's visit, and says the approaching visit of the Prince of Wales to that city is occupying more of the serious attention of the public than any similar event within its recollection.

The Portrait of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales on the preceding page is from a photograph recently taken by Mr. John Watkins, the artist and photographer, of Parliament-street. Mr. Watkins had the honour of attending at Buckingham Palace on Friday and Saturday of the week just prior to his Royal Highness's departure for Canada. His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, Major-General the Hon. R. Bruce, Governor Caulfield, and Captain Eyre, sent to the Prince of Wales, also sat to Mr. Watkins. The Earl of St. Germans and Major Teesdale had previously given sittings to the same artist, so that a series of photographs has been completed by Mr. Watkins of the Prince of Wales and of the gentlemen who officially accompany his Royal Highness to Canada.

CIVIL LIST PENSIONS.

THE following is a list of all pensions granted between the 29th day of June, 1859, and the 30th day of June, 1860, and charged upon the Civil List. The first was granted August 29, 1860, and all the rest January 16, 1860:—

Miss Catherine Mary Molloy, Mrs. Mary Ann Molloy, and Miss Molloy (in addition to the pension of £50 granted to them in 1853).—In consideration of the long and meritorious services of their late father in the Navy, and of their present distressed circumstances.

Miss Caroline Lavlor, Miss Louisa Lavlor, Miss Amelia Lavlor, Miss Adeline Lavlor, Miss Clarinda Lavlor, and Miss Jane Lavlor (sisters of the late Dr. Dionysius Lardner).—£120 in equal proportions.—In consideration of their late brother's labours in the cause of science, and of their scanty means.

Mrs. Helen Gillvery (daughter of Hopmer, the painter).—£100.—In consideration of the loss of her father's property as detailed in the memorial.

Dr. Robert Bickey.—£100.—In consideration of his exertions to aid and promote the establishment of his metallurgical operations in Australia.

Mr. Edward Atherstone.—£25.—(In addition to the pension of £75 granted to him in 1851.)—In consideration of his great services to literature and of his advanced age.

Miss Julia Pardoe.—£100.—In consideration of thirty years' toil in the field of literature, by which she has contributed both to cultivate the public taste and to support a family by her own exertions.

Mrs. Ellen Bennett.—£50.—In consideration of the services of her late husband, Certain Bennett, in the construction of the stars-lenses, and the improvement of British intrusts and of science, during twenty-five years, on the coast of Africa, where he died of fever at the early age of thirty-two.

Dr. Robert Bigsby.—£100.—In consideration of his great services and contributions to the literature of his profession.

The Rev. Henry Logan.—£100.—In consideration of his contributions to the instrumental literature of the country, and his pecuniary losses and depression in consequence of the loss of his eyesight.

Mrs. Lucy Ann Hastings.—In consideration of the labours of her late husband, Bishop of Antigua, and of her distressing position, left with a family of seven children entirely unprovided for.

Mrs. Catherine Linden (daughter of the late Henry Cort).—£50.—In consideration of the public services which have secured to the country from her late father's inventions in the manufacture of iron, and of the large fortune which he sacrificed in the public service.

Miss Caroline Cort (daughter of the late Henry Cort).—£50.—(The same observations apply as in the preceding pension to the name of Miss Caroline Cort.)

Mrs. Janet Taylor.—£50.—In consideration of her benevolent labours among the working classes, and of the loss of her property in connection with the bank which she is placed by the death of her husband.

Mrs. Susan Lee Hall.—In consideration of the great benefits conferred on naval science by her father, the late Sir Samuel Bentham.

Mrs. Charlotte Bowcock.—£50 (in addition to the pension of £50 granted to her in 1858).—In consideration of the long services of her late husband, and father-in-law, as British Consuls in the United States and South America respectively.

THE SUPPLY OF COAL.—Sir R. Murchison, in stating the results of the inquiry into the subject of the supply of coal, observed that the fact that this country exported upwards of 60,000,000 tons of coal annually was enough to show those who were unacquainted with the vast carboniferous resources of the kingdom. It was, however, known that there were yet large unworked strata, and no probable period of exhaustion could be arrived at.

From a list of 1000 marriages in Paris taken from the registers of the 81st Civil, it appears that in 52 of them the bride was between fifteen and sixteen; in 166, from sixteen to seventeen; 219, from eighteen to nineteen; 259, twenty to twenty-one; 189, twenty-two to twenty-three; 69, twenty-four to twenty-five; 31, twenty-six to twenty-seven; 16, twenty-eight to twenty-nine; 18, thirty to thirty-one; 4, thirty-two to thirty-three; 3, thirty-four to thirty-five; 2, thirty-six to thirty-seven; and 1, from thirty-eight to thirty-nine years.

THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

GARIBALDI'S FLYING COLUMN.

GENERAL TURR's column, to which our Special Artist had attached himself, left Palermo, as previously stated, towards the close of last month, its supposed destination being Syracuse. The 21st and 22nd were spent at Misilmeri. On the following morning the troops were again in motion, reaching

SWORD OF HONOUR, PRESENTED TO MARSHAL M'MAHON.

Villafrati at half-past seven. Here the column halted till the 26th, the illness of General Turr, who, finally, had to be replaced by Colonel Bosco, thus place our Special Artist sends us an illustration—"Our Artist in Bivouac before the near Villafrati"—which is engraved on the first page of this Number.

An exploration of the interior of Sicily has its risks as well as its difficulties, and of these our Artist seems to have his share. Thus the Special Correspondent of the Post writes from Vallelunga, on the 8th inst., as follows:—"Apropos of brigands—two friends of mine, of whom one is the pictorial Correspondent of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, left Girgenti four days ago, when returning from a little village, or rather from a group of farmhouses, the property of a certain Count Pasca, of Palermo, situated at a very short distance from Vallelunga. They were attacked by a party of six, but fortunately they were able to make their escape by the speed of the horses in their car.

The Times correspondent gives some further particulars of the flying column's progress. He writes from Caltanissetta on the 3rd inst., as follows:—

"The scarcity of villages in this centre part makes the march of a column in the middle of summer, without tents, and in a country almost devoid of trees except in the immediate neighbourhood of villages, a matter of serious difficulty. No movement is practicable except very early in the morning and late in the afternoon, for you must contrive to find shelter during the heat of the day, when, above all in the time of sirocco, is overpowering. The march from Vallelunga to S. Caterina across the first great spur is one of the most difficult—indeed, some Sicilian miles about twenty-three kilometres, three-fourths of which is a steep ascent. It was trying for a force composed in a great measure of troops not accustomed to marching, and only imperfectly provided with shoes. The day was one of the most oppressive and evening brought no change for the better. Yet it was necessary to continue the march. About six o'clock the column was in marching order; but the number of carts which had been promised never appeared, the general of a fatiguing, did not augur well for the march. That elasticity of step which had hitherto distinguished the Volunteer, did not belong, and even was under the influence of oppressive heat, without a breath of wind, and for the first time that air of languor was apparent which distinguishes the regular conscript soldier in march from the young volunteer full of spirit, and lightly accoutred. Vallelunga, as the name itself indicates, lies at the extremity of a long valley at the foot of the main chain of the Madonia, and is traversed by the first rivulets of one of the most considerable rivers of Sicily, the Platani, which enters the sea between Lisana and Girgenti.

"After a few miles in a valley, which is narrow as well as long, and is inclosed between high mountains, the river is traversed by a stone bridge. Although but three or four miles had been passed, there was a general rush towards the river to find water, which is rather difficult at this time of the year. Fortunately the assertion of the guides, that the river contained nothing but stagnant water, proved untrue; but had it been otherwise it would have been impossible to restrain our thirsty volunteers. After passing the bridge the first ascent begins, short, but rather difficult. By the time the top of it had been reached night had set in, still and calm, with a glorious moon above, but without a breath of air. It was almost impracticable, even to those who were on horseback. The columns of dust which the march of the troops raised on the ill-kept, parched road remained suspended long after the extensive line had passed; still the majority kept up their pluck, and many a footworn and weary youth limped after the column rather than be left behind. But the sight of the many carts with sick began, nevertheless, to exercise considerable attraction on the weary troop, and at each halt there were numbers of aspirants to rest from among the young volunteers. The old Coccistore and the Swiss company of riflemen marched away as if they were in the best condition. It often struck me that the country people have very indifferent ideas of distances which are the most familiar to them; thus, according to their statements, it was only a matter of miles to the top: elastic miles they were, to be sure, and we thought the assent never would have ended. Had it not been for this general longing to arrive at the Fundaco, or inn of Landro, where the Staff Corps were prepared, there would have been much to admire on the road, which winds up on the side of a gorge traversed by a torrent, passing now close to it, and now behind the rocks. After the long procession of cultivated mountain slopes, one would have felt considerable relief in seeing at last some trees; but, as I said before, no one was disposed to admire anything, and every one felt that ill humour coming over him which seizes you when you toil without seeing an end to your toil.

"We arrived at eleven p.m., and it was midnight before all were at rest. Revelli sounded again at three a.m., and although it was to be sure to get the column started. Many more applicants had presented themselves for carts than could be accommodated, and the result was that nine-tenths had to be left behind until carts could be sent up to fetch them. In the midst of the night the wounded National Guard of Piana Cosetina came to meet the column and present its respects. As this rather augmented the dust they were sent forward to announce our arrival.

"The day was just breaking when we reached the top of the pass, unenclosed; it has never been known to snow here even. The difficulty for some time was to fix the eye in any particular direction, so wonderful was the effect of this new atmosphere; but soon all eyes were directed towards the east, where the gigantic mass of Mount Etna appeared towering high above all its companions, with the ruggedness of its rugged sides sprinkled with bands of snow. We were more than 3000 feet above the sea; the middle ground rose the chain of the Madonie to the height of 5000 or 6000 feet; and yet far away in the background there was the giant of volcanoes."

The column was to remain for some time, a week probably, at Caltanisetti, which it reached at the conclusion of this march.

SWORD OF HONOUR PRESENTED TO THE DUKE OF MAGENTA BY THE INHABITANTS OF AUTUN.

SHORTLY after the battle of Magenta, the inhabitants of the town and district of Autun, in the department of the Seine et Loire, of which M'Mahon was the representative, in that great fight, is a native, determined upon raising a subscription for the purpose of presenting a testimonial to the distinguished son of the new Marshal's conduct; and it was soon decided that the said testimonial should consist of a sword in commemoration of the Italian victory. In consequence of much unavoidable delay in its execution, and of some routine difficulties surrounding the presentation, which it was hoped would take place on the first Magenta anniversary (the 4th of June), the sword was only presented to the Duke on the 19th instant at the head-quarters of the army at Chilons, of which the distinguished Marshal has at present the command. A description from the municipality of Autun, accompanied by a fine design of this splendid work of art, M. Schoneverks, who had been sent with the offering to the Marshal's residence at the camp, where they were received with the utmost courtesy by the Marshal and his family.

This sword of honour is happily conceived and well executed. On the handle are two draped figures, representing France and Italy. At the feet of France, represented as a female of strength and security, Italy is seen crouching in a position indicating fear. The danger she dreads is symbolized by a serpent, which, issuing from a lower part of the hilt; the upper part is composed of a winged Victory placing a crown of laurels on the head of France, and a corresponding one on the escutcheon of the arms of the Marshal. In the middle of the guard the Imperial eagle, with its head artistically turned fiercely towards the serpent, opens its wings; and under the eagle is the word "Magenta," of fine brilliants. On the opposite side of the hilt are a figure symbolical of strength, the army of Autun, and the glorious deeds of 1859; of the victory to which the Duke owes his title. The guard, the cupuille, and the handle are, moreover, furnished with ornaments of refined taste, which, although possessing their share of grace and style, are not too striking to affect the prominence naturally desired for the allegorical personages. The figures are in frosted gold, upon a gold ground.

On the blade is an inscription recording the fact that the sword was presented to the Marshal by the city and district of Autun. The extremity of the sheath is also richly ornamented in the style of the Renaissance, with a group of figures of armour.

The idea of the artist, M. Schoneverks, to whom is due the credit of this happy design, is grand, appropriate, and is also associated with much grace the glory of the hero of Magenta with the glory of France, and has added by this work to his well-merited reputation as a sculptor remarkable for his taste and for the purity and elevation of his artistic execution, proved by the presence of many of his works in the Palace of Industry. The entire ornamentation was executed by M. Wesse, and the carving to M. Honoré, both gentlemen advantageously known in the world of art, and who have contributed their full share towards rendering the Marshal's sword of honour a model of grace and perfection.

The Augsburg Gazette states that the international congress of chemists, which was to have been held last spring, is fixed to meet at Carlsruhe on the 3rd of September. The object of the meeting is declared to be all eminent chemists, and especially to professors of chemistry in public schools and colleges.

GOODWOOD.

See the course throng'd with saucer, the sports are begun.—C. BIDDIS.

Hills that adjoin the Duke of Richmond's park, and was more numerously attended. But it is not our intention to dwell upon the sport, which has been duly recorded in the newspapers, referring to it as a gathering of the million, to which the majority are attracted quite as much for the beauty of the scenery, the purity of the air, and the splendid coup d'œil, as for the racing. What can exceed the view from the top of the Grand Stand? The English Channel, with Selsea Bill, Portsmouth, the Isle of Wight, yachts to the naked eye; bold hills of various elevations, intersected by rich and highly-cultivated vales; the swelling promontory, and the lovely glen appear in quick succession to animate and give interest to the prospect; while the extensive forests and plantations which overspread it in every direction, the pasture land with which it is contracted, give to it a rural and a rich diversity of appearance. Nor will the antiquarian be unmindful of ancient and modern arts; the palace, the poor, fail to be interested as he traces the Roman encampment on the South Downs, pauses to look at the cross erected by Bishop Rede in 1270, views the Cathedral and the Isle of Wight, the richly-ornamented tombs, the exquisitely carved choir, the finely-executed pictures and portraits, the beautiful altar of Grinling workmanship, the marble monuments, and the sepulchral stones adorned with brass. Here the poet Collins, who wrote such exquisite odes in the language, Hayley, denounced by Byron, and Huskisson, the practical statesman, are buried. Flaxman's tablet to the unfortunate Chatterton, the boy poet, and a full-length marble statue of the ill-fated senator, will be looked at with that respect and veneration due to their talents. Independent of the beauties of nature which characterise this meeting, we might refer to the brilliant assembly that congregate in the Grand Stand and in the paddock (of which more anon), the family circle, according to the poet, "leads enchantment to the view") gives the scene the appearance of a highly-ornamented flower garden filled with parterres of pink, yellow, rose, white, orange, crimson, scarlet, blue, violet, sable-green, and azure. A bon mot that we have not enjoyed to the latter colour will rank as worthy of record. "Green has quite superseded nature," remarked one of a crème de la crème of society. "Yes," replied a lisping guardsman, "one might call it truly say—Anno Domini 1859, Nemex est ton; 1860, nemexis ton." With this bright thought we proceed to note the residence of the Duke of Richmond, which includes the three contiguous estates of Goodwood, Halnaker, and Westhampnett. The first was purchased about the year 1720 by Charles, son of Henry Duke of Portsmouth, by the "merry Monarch," upon whom the dignity of Duke was conferred. Halnaker and Westhampnett came into the family until 1765, when it was added by the third Duke of Richmond to the other entailed estates. Westhampnett, which comprises upwards of eighteen hundred acres, is also purchased by the same noble family. Halnaker House, which was built in the reign of Henry VIII., is now a perfect ruin, and is the only spot on this large and well-wooded tract of that castellated style peculiar to the age of the Tudors. In one of those beautiful yet ephemeral works of the day—the Almanac—we find "A Legend of Halnaker," which contains a very graphic account of the visit of the unfortunate Edward VI. to this place in 1551. The park contained a considerable timber, and a splendid avenue of Spanish chestnut-trees. The manor-house of Westhampnett, formerly the property of Sir Hendrie Apsley Bart., was purchased and converted into a union workhouse; and let those who cavil at the present poor-law system only visit this establishment, and they will find that every comfort and luxury which can be had by the aged, sickly, and bodily wants of their destitute brethren are dispensed with the most liberal hand. They will find happy and contented old soldiers cheerful, well fed, and cleanly attired; test their knowledge of the Bible and it will be found that many of those, poor in the eyes of the world, who have chosen the "one thing that is needful," are rich in treasures far above earthly value. Return we to Goodwood, which in the Domesday MSS. is thus described:—"The Church of Elisabeth, Goodwood Manor, with its appendages, and two houses, four gardens, two orchards, two hundred acres of park land, ten of arable, five hundred of pasture, and three hundred of wood." The original mansion, a Gothic structure, of which no painting or print is in existence, was pulled down by an edifice erected under the direction of Sir William Chambers, and which now forms part of the present building. In 1800 the third Duke of Richmond, who was a great patron of the arts, and who had expended a large sum upon the improvement of the estate, commenced those additions and alterations which have produced the present noble domain. The house consists of a principal front, with a colonnade; a portrico of six Doric pillars supports another of an equal number of Ionic, and a third, pedimental stone, extending nearly one hundred and seventy feet, and terminated by two towers with hemispherical roofs; the wings, each presenting a front of a hundred and ten feet, are also terminated by similar towers. With the exception of the façade, which formed part of the building erected by Sir William Chambers, the whole of the interior

THE FARM.

THE rain, which set in again towards the middle of last week, has helped on the aftermath, but made both the hay and crop prospects once more exceedingly critical. We never remember such a sodden, wretched sort of summer; and the hay in many parts has no colour and still less fragrance. The farmers are working up their wheat stocks very close, and even a 57s. 7d. average fails to bring out average samples. In Silesia heavy rains have done much damage to the cut corn; at Riga the weather has been wet, but no damage reported as yet. Crops are promising in Odessa, which, like Poland, has a pretty nearly escaped the locust scourge. In Spain the harvest is satisfactory; and in Portugal a good average is anticipated, but much wanted.

The Highland Agricultural Society holds its meeting at Dumfries on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; and the two first of those days will find the Yorkshire agriculturists in the showyard at Pontefract. The Yorkshire part of the Midland district is fixed for Wednesday next.

The Dublin Spring show, and cut such a poor figure at Canterbury, produced a splendid average of £84 12s. 10s. at Mr. Chaloner's sale. The highest-priced female was Miss Warlaby (by Baron Warlaby from Ophelia by Hamlet), who completed her eighth year that day, and was knocked down to Mr. Wallis for 250gs. Mr. Barnes, who is quite the Richard Booth of Ireland, out of respect to Ophelia, whom he still considers to have been the best cow, gave 200gs. for her nine weeks' granddaughter May Queen, by Dr. M'Hale; and as Sheet Anchor, by Harbinger, headed the bulls' bidders at 350gs. to Mr. Tyrie's nod, the sire of Miss Warlaby and her son and daughter was 280gs. Bonny Lass, by Ringwould, and her daughter Bon Ard, by Sir Samuel, averaged 285 guineas; and Lady Portia, May Dew, and Pearl, by Hopewell and Harbinger, from Hamlet cows, Julia, Lady Figot, May Maid, Forget-me-Not, and Juliana, all looked 60 guineas and upwards. Mr. Pawlett went in for May 90 guineas, and Rifaid Wreath 31 guineas; and Mr. Howard Vyse secured the Duke of Leinster from Mr. Barnes in conjunction with his "confederate." Mr. Robinson for May Maid; but we are glad to see Mr. Robinson had sufficient public-spirited and spirit to keep nearly all the other lots on their own side of the Channel. Mr. Stewart, of Southwick's sale, with all its Rose of Autumn and Fame old Cheery blood," comes off on Tuesday; the day before the Highland show at Dumfries, from which place, as well as Dalkeith, regular coaches will start; and on December 31st Mr. Stratford holds a still larger sale of Mr. Duddings of Panton's herd, which amounts to nearly 100 head. Its foundation was laid with Milton Children in 1829, and Rose, Booth, and Townley blood has been steadily infused into it ever since.

The Canterbury meeting preceding Southdown ewes has been confirmed at Chichester. Lord Walsingham separated the Duke of Richmond and Mr. Rasaman in Kent; but here it was all that the latter gentleman could do to get rid of the Duke, who was quite out of luck with his rams, as Mr. Rigden beat him for both prizes in both classes. The Chichester show will be held on the ground of Mr. H. Paine's, both let and sold well. At the former place a ram was sold for 28 gs., and one ewe let for a month at 15 gs.; and, at the latter, the ram lambs were in great request, and averaged about 40 gs. The sale of Mr. Gillett's Cotswold shearling rams—which have faces and legs as good as Mr. Druce's—attracted numerous customers, desire—was very successful, and several out of the sixty ranged from 50 gs. to 75 gs. One of Mr. Druce's averaged 62 gs., and the sixty-five ewes fifty-two at £16. 1os. The lettings and sales for next week include Mr. Lane's Cotswolds, on Monday; Mr. Fletcher's, of Shipton, on Wednesday; and Mr. Druce's 220 Cotswolds and Leicester shearlings. Mr. Garne's Oxford Downs are to be let by private contract, and may be seen every day this week in connection with the Chichester show. I have to record the death of the venerable Mr. Samuel Druce, one of the earliest and staunchest supporters of the Oxfordshire Agricultural Society, and one of the founders of the Oxfordshire Down flock, which had been in such a weakly state for some time past that he felt compelled to withdraw the counter the Royal Agricultural Society, whose his place was taken by his son; and a fall from a carriage, about a fortnight since, accelerated his death, which took place in his seventy-second year.

The winners of the head prize for the grass and clover mowing-machine at Salisbury, Burgess and Key (Patent Reaper Company, by, is a Barnard), form a very seasonable illustration, along with the machine in question, of the present number of the Farmer's Magazine. The partnership between them was formed in 1849, and in 1850 they brought out the American churn, called Anthony's patent, which won the head prize at the Exeter Show in 1850, at Hyde Park in 1851, and at four other Royal gatherings, to say nothing of local ones. It is said that upwards of 10,000 of them have been sold in England and the colonies. In 1851 this successful venture was followed up by a reaper, and M'Cormick's American was the one they determined upon bringing over. Every year from the date of the first trial of M'Cormick in Hyde Park before the firm succeeded in doing away with the enormous labour of raking off the grass and corn machine-reaped, reducing the attendance on it to a mere boy capable of driving a pair of horses. A reward of the Royal Society's first prize at the trial at Leigh Court, where it cut a swath of nearly 5 feet 6 inches, was confirmed at Salisbury in 1857, and it is now in full use in the Vale of Aylesbury. The average performance of it is about fifteen acres per day—a most important matter, now that the weather is so shaking and uncertain. The combination implement for grass and clover is also of Transatlantic production, and it has been very much improved since last year, when it carried off the special prize at Chelmsford. It is a mixture of Bentalls and Crosskill and Victorines, besides the Canterbury and Norwich prizes. At the latter place the competition evidenced a very trying year of black and white," or, in other words, sanfoin and rye-grass, and the work of the winning mower was very efficient. The works at Brentwood are now entirely devoted to the purposes of reapers and mowers, and Parkes's steel digging-forks are also a very important specialty of the firm.

Apropos of the Canterbury meeting, we may also mention that the gate price, which was was last year by Mr. Torr, of Aylesby, has been awarded to Lord Leigh, of Stoneleigh. John Booth, of Killerby, was second, and highly commended for a pole, whose merits have been already adjusted by means of a mower and manufactured by Mr. Busby, of Bedale. The Kentish men, or men of Kent (we forget the logical distinction between the terms), are very sore about the failure of their ploughs, and have now made a comforting discovery, to the effect that the plough-tackle, and not the inefficiency of the implement, was to blame for "a failure more apparent than real." This is the old story of the diner-out who always puts his wife's morning mistakes down to "it must have been that salmon." However, they have sent a friendly challenge to Mr. Hornsby to try his plough on a piece of stiff land in Mid Kent against the old Kentish plough as improved. We are glad to find that the flat has shew receipts (£2730) were not worse than they have been at preceding meetings, and with its £6187, and Warwick, with its £5461, were bumpers; but Canterbury does not fall so far short of Chelmsford's £2988, and it is splendid in comparison with Lewes's £1184.

The South Kensington Museum was visited last week by 10,666 persons. On Monday, Tuesday, and Saturday (free days), there were 4,759; on Monday and Tuesday (free evenings), 809; on the three students' days (admission to the public 6d.), 1178; one students' evening (Wednesday), 164.

Last Saturday morning notices were posted at the southern media drainage works in the Newcross-road, Deptford, which operations have been suspended for six weeks, requiring the men formerly engaged to resume work at six o'clock this morning, when the work will be pushed forward as quickly as possible.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A FOUR-AND-TWENTY GAME.—The committee of the Manchester Chess Society have determined to give a prize for the best problem submitted to them, under the following conditions viz.:—1. Each competitor may submit six problems. 2. No problem shall consist of less than three, or more than five moves. 3. Every problem submitted shall be placed in the hands of the committee before the 31st day of August next. 4. The problem shall be original, and which has not been previously published, or which is not the original composition of the author. 5. The problem which shall be adjudged by the committee to be the best in conformity with the above conditions, and which is followed by any special condition as to the mode in which mate is to be effected." 6. The local committee will publish in the report of the proceedings such of the problems submitted as they may consider worthy of publication; and no competitor shall publish any problem until after the publication of the annual report.

The above is a positional example by Messrs. Kling and Horwitz, the Beaumont and Fletcher of chess problem composition, who gave it with the accompanying remark, "Remarkable for the lure, Black is to draw the game," and subsequently published a solution of singular ingenuity and elegance. Our acute correspondent, Captain Jenkins, has, however, detected that, against the best play on White's side, Black cannot positively avert the mate. The stipulations, therefore, now are—White to play and win the game.

The Toulonnais says that on the occasion of the visit of the Emperor and Empress to Toulon their Majesties will be entertained with an international regatta, and that an immense number of strangers, attracted by the arsenal—the accumulation of half a century—will be burnt up to find quality to the scene.

LITERATURE AND ART.

THOSE intermirable paper duties! Those dreadful paper duties! Rags and bones have long been twin articles of merchandise in the shops of of marine-store dealers; but now the two seem to have become one, and every rag in the housekeeper's wastebag is turned into a bone of contention. Never was there a more anomalous, inconsistent, contradictory, paradoxical controversy than the "paper war" of 1860. A literary Chancellor of the Exchequer wants to give the people cheap paper. A literary Leader of the Opposition wants a tax of cheap paper. A journal which itself declared that it would be a gainer of forty thousand a year by the repeal of the tax is now one of the fiercest opponents of any remission of taxation, and opens its columns to paper-makers who vehemently protest against any exemption from the baneful presence of the exciseman. Was there ever such a galumatias of conflicting interests? Happy are the newspapers whose popularity remains unaffected by the repeal or by the reverse of the impost. We suppose that the duty will come off some day; meanwhile we are of Lord Fahlland's opinion, and counsel "Peace, peace, peace! There are so many things to wrangle about besides paper! Let us close the ragbag for a time, with a subdued certainty that the advocates of cheap paper will ultimately have the best of it.

By-the-way, what is this modern delusion so passionately insisted upon that paper can't be made from any material but rags? We have a tolerable memory, and can call to mind a period not so very long since when an enthusiastic papyrologist was permitted to enumerate in the columns of the very journal which now puts its faith to rags and to rags alone, no less than fifty-seven different substances admirably available for the manufacture in question. To be sure, there is some little danger of the Egyptian mummies about which we read so much lately in the raw-material field. It is well to bear in mind the rebuke administered to a German savant who boasted that he could make paper "out of anything" by an anonymous correspondent who sent him per goods waggon, a dead donkey, with a polite request to make paper out of that.

It is never our wish to interfere in literary squabbles, or to give currency to "Scandal about Society," as we were the first to censure in this column a very disgraceful reprint by a contemporary of some vile gossip traducing the editor and proprietor of the Cornhill Magazine which had appeared in an American newspaper; but we must say that we should call attention to the letter of the disagreeable topic by Mr. Thackeray in the current number of the Cornhill. In a poignant "Roundabout Paper," which, by the usual circumlocutory process, seemed to "screw itself into existence," the editor administers a quiet but still condign castigation to the imprudent scribe who, on the principle of the ostrich hiding his head in the sand and so thinking nobody could see his tail, imagined that he had concealed his title-deeds to a thousand miles away no one in England would ever read a syllable of it. Thus also reasoned M. Edmond About when he translated an Italian novel and published it as an original work—"Tolla." Then, to the consternation of the unskilful pirate, arose the French reviewer who discovered the plagiarism, and halted in his repos to exclaim, "Ahs! Monsieur About, vous avies compté sans les bibliotaires." The indiscreet correspondent of the Cornhill has reckoned without his host—the host of those envious and malicious, who were but too glad to "pass the scandal on," and to give it additional publicity.

The hasty fair in aid of the funds of the Royal Dramatic College took place at the Crystal Palace on Saturday last, and was most brilliantly successful. The stalls were presided over by some of the most distinguished and popular performers in the histrionic profession, among whom Mrs. Stirling, Miss Swanborough, and Mrs. Alfred Mellon appeared to be for the nonce the most successful in a commercial point of view. The "takings" of the lady stallkeepers were exceedingly large; and, on the other hand, the gentlemen of the profession who went in for the management of "Cheap Johns" and "Aunt Sallies" saw their industry and energy rewarded by very bountiful returns. Mr. Paul Bedford was a marvellous "Cheap John," and Mr. J. Took won golden opinions from all sorts of people by his improvisation of a horrific German melodrama in connection with a peepshow. A literary as well as a dramatic and artistic interest was lent to the proceedings by Mr. Benjamin Webster's recitation of an eloquent address written expressly for the occasion by Mr. Robert Bell.

The veteran dramatist's name has set out once more in the list of his friends and admirers—whose name must be legion—to view an elaborate drawing which he has just completed, entitled "The Worship of Bacchus." We record this to take leave to say that we have seen a cut of the drawing this week; but many days will not elapse ere we shall be enabled to present, the latest of the productions of the artistic Nestor, in detail.

No confidence need be violated in referring to the report long circulated, but which has now assumed an aspect of certainty, that the editorship of the Quarterly Review has changed hands, and that the learned and sound old Tory has laid down that onerous post in favour of an erudite gentleman from the north, a Mr. MacPherson, which will be doubtless highly considered ornaments to Scottish literary society has thus been transplanted from his native heath—we perceive that the void (necessarily) created will be filled, so far as the "Modern Athens" is concerned, by an eminent Edinburgh publisher who has been bold enough to go back to his native land. Mr. James Hannay, already well known as a novelist, and regarded by many as a successful to Edinburgh, there to reside permanently and to edit one of the best-known Tory papers published in that city. England is decidedly the loser by the migration of one of her most accomplished adopted children: but we trust that Mr. Hannay's secession from the south is not considered as a "Lo, the poor Indian!" affair. For we look on the metropolis of literature and art; but in actuality there is but one metropolis of Anglo-Saxon letters, and that is London. "Trot chemin même à Rome," says the old proverb; and the goal of every literary man should be Fleet-street.

How many of our readers are not of the Upper Ten Thousand permitted to peruse a genuine Royal letter! Who does not remember the curiosity that was excited in 1848 when the Revue Rétrospective published portions of the correspondence between the Royal families of France and England—a correspondence which had been discovered in the portfolio of Louis-Philippe's secretary on the flight of that unfortunate King from the Tuileries. Through a more legitimate channel the entire public have been lately enabled to see the kindly and generous letter addressed by her Majesty the Queen in answer to Mr. Buchanan's note inviting the Prince of Wales to come to Washington. "My good friend," begins the good Queen of England, and in "ever your good friend" she concludes her cordial communication to the American President. In amusing contradistinction to the simple but affectionate style of the mistress of earth's mightiest empire comes the official letter of Lord John Russell to Mr. Dallas, the American Minister, in which the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs resorts as "the undersigned" to all the gravia and verbiage and periphrases consecrated by so many ages of gravitas and pedantry.

We have had a "Slang Dictionary" published lately, which appears to have gone already through two editions. We trust that on the occasion of the next issue care will be taken to insert the choice little specimen of political argot exemplified in the "laying down pipe" to which the Times has given the stamp of notoriety in a letter about the good Queen of England, and in "ever your good friend" she concludes her cordial communication to the American President. "To lay down pipe" is, apparently, for a member of Parliament to make himself as popular as possible in order to get rechosen at the next general election. By-the-way, would it be erroneous or correct to say that the celebrated Mr. Horsman has been "laying down pipe" for Stroud recently to the extent of several miles a night?

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD ELPHINSTONE, G.C.B.

THE Right Hon. Sir John Elphinstone, G.C.B., G.C.H., and P.C., thirteenth Baron Elphinstone, of Elphinstone, in the county of Haddington, in the peerage of Scotland, and Baron Elphinstone, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, late Governor of Bombay, died on the 19th inst., at his temporary residence, 26, Wood-street, Cheapside, King-street, St. James's: he left Bombay in the middle of August, as it was hoped in improved health, and reached London on the 12th ult., after a fatiguing voyage, which he long outlasted fatally. Lord Elphinstone was the only son of the twelfth Lord Elphinstone, by his second wife, Clementina, eldest daughter of Cornelius Elliott, Esq., of Woodcot, Oxfordshire, and widow of Sir John Gibson Lockhart, and was born on the 23rd of June, 1807, and had not reached his seventh year when he succeeded, on the demise of his father, the 21st of May, 1814, to the family honours and Hereditary Jurisdiction. Some years afterwards he entered the British Army as a Cornet and Sub-Lieutenant in the 3rd Light Dragoons, in which regiment he became a Captain in consequence of his few years later he relinquished the military profession, and took up his residence in Scotland, where he married, in 1830, Lady Dalrymple Hamilton, with whom he returned to England, and after a short residence in London, in which he was a Lord in Waiting, but for a short time only, he went to Canada. After three years' residence there he came to India in 1841, and was a Lord in Waiting to the Queen, and created a Peer of the United Kingdom, by the title of Baron Elphinstone, of Elphinstone, in the county of Dumbarton, by patent dated 13th December, 1843, and was nominated a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, civil division, in 1847. He was made Governor of Bombay in 1853, and was invested with the Grand Cross of the Star of India in 1861. During his government of Bombay he was created a Knight Grand Commander of the Bath, civil division, in 1857, was made Commander-in-Chief in the Bombay Presidency in 1858, and was nominated a member of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council in 1859. He was also Colonel of the 78th Highlanders, and Colonel-Commandant of Royal Bombay Engineers. He was twice married, first to Lady Dalrymple Hamilton, who died in 1847, and secondly to Elizabeth, daughter of Admiral Sir Edward Owen, G.C.B., who survives him. He had issue by his first wife, but all his children died young. His eldest brother, Lord Arthur Marcus Cecil Hill, P.C., now Lord Sandys, who was born in 1798, succeeded to the family honours on the death of his father, in 1814. The youngest daughter of Joseph Blake, Esq., of South Carolina, descended from Joseph Blake, brother and first admiral of Robert Blake, the General at Sea, and sister to the Admiral's daughters. His eldest daughter, the Hon. Mary Georgiana Caroline, is the wife of Sir Samuel Dacres Gaselee, Knight, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Calcutta, and who received the thanks of Parliament for his services. George John Elphinstone, the second son, was appointed Second Lieutenant in the Royal Engineers in 1862. He was with the Army in Sicily in 1812, and in the following year joined the Army in the Peninsula, where he was very active and most gallantly employed. He was engaged on the eastern coast of Spain with Lord Lynedoch, at the battle of Castalla, and in the defence of Tarragona and the siege of Tarragona. He, in 1815, served as commanding engineer of the Anglo-Sicilian Army under Prince Maurice Lobkowitz, and was present at Mauheuge, Landrecy, Maricnburg, Philippeville, and Rocroy, and continued with the Army of Occupation until 1818. For services rendered in Canada he was created a Knight of Guelph, and was the son of General John Harding, B.A., who was second in command to the Duke of Wellington at Quatre Bras and Waterloo, and was made a Peer of the United Kingdom, by the title of Baron Harding, of Ashton-under-Lyne, and

THE LAST RAG OF PROTECTION.

PERHAPS the most singular circumstance of the singular Session of 1860 is the fact that on the 6th of August the two parties of which the House of Commons is nominally composed should be banded in their respective ranks for a keen encounter of their wits and their votes. Still more remarkable is it that the gathering cries on either side should be the old watchwords of Free-trade and Protection. The last dirty rag of Protection is the question of the import duty on foreign paper, and on that the Conservatives and the Liberals are to try conclusions once more. It has been known for some time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is prepared to act on that article of the commercial treaty with France by which it was contracted that the customs duty imposed on manufactured paper coming into this country should be so regulated as to be on an equality with the amount of the excise duty levied on that article when manufactured in England. If the representative branch of the Legislature had been permitted to exercise their pure and privileged functions, unobstructed by the unconstitutional interference of the House of Lords, the excise duty on paper in this country would have ceased on the 1st of August. In fulfilment of the compact which has been entered into with France a corresponding remission of the entire customs duty would have taken place. As it is—as the House of Lords has been so good as to tax the people, and to break the rounded uniformity of the financial arrangements of the year, by an act which has resulted in the retention of the excise duty of three halfpence per pound on manufactured paper — the course of the Government, although changed in its detail, remains the same in its principle, and that is an assimilation of the excise and customs duties on this article. This it is which Mr. Gladstone proposes to do; and it is on this point that a direct, a formal, and probably a fierce party contest is about to ensue, at a period of the year and of the Session when, in the ordinary routine of things, the business of the House of Commons should be the passing of the Appropriation Bill through its stages, the affair terminating with that last faint cheer from the few lingering unattached members, and the Parliamentary officials of the Government, which bespeaks a grateful sense of release, of rest, and of proximate pure air. Encouraged, nay stimulated, by an organisation originating with a few monopolising capitalists, and backed by the venal and interested support of a newspaper which has per fas aut nefas reached to the worst eminence of journalism, the Opposition has determined to try conclusions with the Government in general and Mr. Gladstone in particular on this question.

Advantage has been taken of a timid and shortsighted reaction which has set in, and that in quarters where it ought least to have been expected, against the financial scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, both in reference to its direct operation on the trade and commerce of the country and also in reference to the treaty with France, to make a run on that Minister personally. Many of those who were the loudest, in the half-witted enthusiasm of their cheers, when Mr. Gladstone's eloquence was rushing like a Congreve rocket through the House of Commons, now go whining and moping about with staring but lacklustre eyes, looking for patent and full-grown results from a financial policy which is yet only in process of germination. We use that term advisedly, because, although the arrangements connected

FRANCE.

The Emperor Napoleon has addressed to M. de Persigny, the French Ambassador at our Court, a letter on his policy towards this country. His Majesty's letter, we believe, we give in full elsewhere, includes, it will be seen, the most friendly regard towards England.

The Empress has left Plombières at Eaux Bonnes, in the Pyrenees, and is occupied in taking baths, and in long promenades in the neighbourhood.

Some brilliant reviews of the artillery and infantry of the Imperial Guard took place last week at Satory and the Bois de Boulogne, in the presence of the Emperor.

By a decree on Sunday's Moniteur the scale of the état-major of the Army is raised permanently to what it consisted of during the Crimean and Italian wars—viz., to 589 officers of all ranks, from Colonel to Lieutenant.

The Moniteur announces that the differences between France and the Republic of Peru have been amicably arranged.

The events of the Lebanon, and the military preparations which are taking place in consequence, absorb all public attention at Marseilles and Toulon.

THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

Nothing could well be more confused than were the accounts from Sicily last week. Garibaldi had started from Palermo by water—so much was certain; but whether his force was two, or three, or four thousand strong, and what was his destination, were matters of conjecture. Then there was the statement that the Neapolitan army had left Sicily by the end of the month. This we hope will be found premature, at least so far as the accomplishment of the Royal order was concerned. We have at length definite intelligence of the doings of Garibaldi, assuming the chief interest of the drama now being enacted in Sicily necessarily centres. He has been engaged in enterprises requiring much patience, in which a stray bullet or bayonet-thrust might at any moment have extinguished the man whose life it is scarcely too much to say the hopes of Italy for the present rest. The town of Milazzo (a small town situated on the seacoast, seven leagues from Messina, and opposite to the islands of Lipari), commencing at the bridge of Faro, and ending with the fortress of Milazzo, on the 20th Garibaldi stormed the town, and took it at the point of the bayonet. Some of the accounts describe the fighting as tremendous; until 1223 Neapolitans were killed, besides a great number wounded, including Garibaldi himself, who was severely cut in the foot.

July 21.

Yesterday, at six a.m., the battle commenced at Milazzo, and was not over until eight in the evening. The struggle was terrible, and continued long the whole line. There was a great carnage of the Bourbonists, who fought with much obstinacy, but were completely overthrown, and put to flight after a shower of grape. The field of battle, covered with dead bodies of the enemy, and with hundreds of wounded, is a sad and terrible spectacle, presenting a series of "Long live Italy!" "Long live Garibaldi!" Our young men vied in enthusiasm with the veterans, and displayed the greatest valour in the combat, and the first to charge with the bayonet, to storm Milazzo, and to take the fort, were the young students of Pavia, Genoa, and Turin. The Bourbonists close with the bayonet. Our loss has not been excessive. The regiment Calatafimi has suffered the most, having had among it many killed, also suffered very little, but the loss of the continental soldiers has been considerable. Among the wounded commanders of the Bourbonists are the enemy, who in flying was driven into the redoubts, and from them into the sea of the Marina, where he was drowned. Medici has also been severely cut off. This morning, the 21st, Bosco presented himself to the Dictator, and requested leave to go to Naples on account of ill health. The Dictator said, "you shall have dismissal, if you please." Fabrizi and Interdonato have marched in front of the Neapolitan troops at Messina. The Dictator is in a position withdrew immediately to Messina. The Dictator, in a cavalry engagement, has taken from the enemy the horse of the general of the staff. Major of the Neapolitan corps that was pursuing him; after which the Neapolitan cavalry were driven back in confusion. Garibaldi pursued the enemy with obstinacy. Long live Italy! Long live Victor Emmanuel!

We extract from a letter of Alexandre Dumas, the eye-witness of the event, a fine description of Garibaldi himself. He had directed a movement to take the Neapolitans in flank, when he found it was a matter of necessity to be "first in the front rank of danger":—

"Misori and Captain Stanella then advanced into the road with about fifty men, and Garibaldi, placing himself at their head, shouted, 'Avanti, Bersagli.' The Neapolitans with grape, discharged six fire at a distance of twenty paces. The effect was terrible. Only five or six men remained standing. Misori had his head carried away, and the stirrup shot away. His horse, being wounded, became unmanageable, and he was obliged to dismount. Then, with his sword in his hand, he charged. A trumpeter were killed at his side. Misori fell under his horse, which was mortally wounded by a bomb. Stanella alone remained standing amidst the heaps of slain below, and, with a return stroke laid open his cheek. Three or four sabres were raised against him, but, while he parried the blows of one, he pierced the breast, right through the chest, of another, and the horse of a third with three shots of his revolver, Stanella brings another to the ground, and a dozen Neapolitans who fled at the sight of Mario (his wife) were pursued by a fourth barrel of his revolver. Whilst this struggle of giants is proceeding, Garibaldi once more rallies his scattered troops, allowing for some exaggeration on the part of the great romancer, there is enough to prove that the combat must have been of the most desperate character. Garibaldi entered Milazzo in triumph, but not consolidating their liberties without going through the baptême du feu.

When the town was taken, Garibaldi ordered thirty-nine of the inhabitants, among whom were several gendarmes, to be shot, for having fired on the people with water only during the revolt.

Garibaldi has entered Messina. A military convention has been concluded between Garibaldi and General Clary upon the following terms:—"The Neapolitan troops in possession of the forts of Santa Syracuse, Agosta, and Messina, and to have liberty of access to all the forts of the province of Messina will be allowed to depart from the town. The Garibaldian colours to take equal rank with the Neapolitan flag. The navigation of the Strait of Messina to be free."

The Patrie of Monday says:—"In consequence of the convention concluded between Generals Clary and Garibaldi, there will be a cessation of hostilities during 24 hours. King Francis and each preserve the positions they now occupy."

Garibaldi, before leaving Palermo, published a decree ordering that all the acts of the Government should be performed in the name of Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy. The Dictator delegated his powers to M. Sirtori, as Minister, and who will conduct the Government during his absence.

The Sardinian agent, M. Depretis, arrived on the 21st ult. at Palermo, and was received at once to the camp.

Garibaldi has received an accession of two fine steamers from England, and the gift of his birth, and a considerable sum of money. Kossuth's staff had arrived.

The Liverpool committees will not enter upon their duties until the 6th instant.

A medal has been struck at Palermo in honour of Garibaldi. It is on a large scale, and the remarkable feature to be General is perfect. It commemorates the landing at Marsala on the 21st of May, the capture of Palermo on the 27th, and gives the names of the chiefs who followed the General in his expedition—La Masa, Carini, Siocco, Carioli, Nino Bixio, Crispi, and Anfossi. It also bears the name of the General himself, and the year of his birth.

A lady from Paris has left for Sicily, taking with her a present to Garibaldi from a French armourer. The gift is a coat of mail, dagger-proof and bullet-proof. Its workmanship is perfect, and it is valued at upwards of 6000*l*. It may be worn under a uniform like a shirt, for it is extremely flexible, light, and portable.

NAPLES.

An insurrection has broken out at Avellino, a town twenty-five miles to the east of Naples. The foreign troops fired on the inhabitants and plundered several houses. At Gaeta the soldiers shouted "Down with the Constitution!" "Long live Maria Theresa!" The next day the Commander, Pianelli, promised to disband the foreign troops.

Transported, last week, to the Neapolitan gaols, and he was distributed in cells themselves, but sixteen persons belonging to the Court have been exiled. Numerous refugees have returned to Naples, among whom are General Ulloa and Signor Davala.

The King has accepted the resignation of the Marquis de Antonini, the Neapolitan Ambassador at Paris, who is to be succeeded by Commander Consiglieri.

THE INTERVIEW AT TOEPLITZ.

The meeting at Toeplitz, as Prussia's official organ paper, to have issued in a complete understanding between Austria and Prussia for the combined protection of the interests and maintenance of the integrity of the German Confederation.

The official Prussian Gazette contains a leading article in which the following passage occurs:—"The frank and cordial friendship of the two Princes and their principal advisers, and the mutual exchange of their views, have brought the relative positions of the two States into a clearer light. A mutual understanding on the most important questions of European policy has been found to exist. It there-fore appears to us to arrive at the conditions of a sincere union. In this union Germany will find fresh guarantees for her security, and may hope that in future the importance of her interests will be better in the balance of power in Europe. Europe will by the Toeplitz meeting obtain fresh guarantees for the maintenance of public peace and for the respect of the public rights."

SWITZERLAND.

The Session of the Swiss Federal Assembly has closed, and the long and irritating discussions on the Savoy affair have had no other result than to confirm purely and simply the powers previously conferred on the Federal Council.

SYRIA.

THE MASSACRE AT DAMASCUS.

Advices have been received from Damascus to the 12th of July, confirming the statement of the massacre of the Christians in the unfortunate city of Asiatic Turkey. Damascus is one of all Moslems a holy town, as from it depute and to it arrives every year the Mecca pilgrimage caravan, to which it is the rendezvous. Its population is 150,000, of which 120,000 are Moslems, 15,000 Christians, and the remainder Jews. Before the end of last January the Christians, and others commenced, and more particularly since it became every day more and more evident that the Powers of Europe were resolved to punish the Druses, the more disreputable Moslems of Damascus began to partially to show their hostility to Christians. . . . The enemy, . . . became exceedingly threatening, daily more frightened, the other hourly more insolent, until at last, on the morning of the 9th instant, the Christian quarter was fired from various churches, a mob of Moslem bads were busy in the streets making excuses in order to enter houses, and pillage, before leaving, the accursed spot. . . . At two o'clock p.m. on Monday came three hundred of the lowest Moslems of Damascus, and invaded the Christian quarter, crying out, "Slay the dogs of Christians!" and immediately the work of plunder, burning, and slaughter commenced. Ahmed Pasha had received several contradictory orders of the place—a Field Marshal in the sultan's army—and as soon as he heard of the first outbreak he sent a strong body of cavalry and several hundred regular troops and several field-pieces, not a man now can did he move. The Russian Consul, Mr. Tchiha, with his wife, fled to the roof of their house. Christians who did not take refuge with the famous Algerine chief, Abd-el-Kader (who has settled in Damascus with his tribe), were murdered in the streets. . . . But, although the affair might have been stopped with the greatest ease before dusk on Monday, the Christians were left unmolested to be murdered. Late in the evening about 300 soldiers were sent to put a stop to the outrages, but the mob, instead of dispersing, took to arms, and the Moslems and the Christians tried to escape from the flames they were thrust back on the burning houses by the soldiers and the Moslem populace. . . . . When the last despatches left Damascus, at two p.m. on Thursday, the 12th inst., the fires were still burning in the Christian quarter, and unchecked, not merely so, but worse than ever, for the miscreant fanatics of the place had been yet more excited by the arrival of Moslems, who had made present-rations, who were only too happy for the chance of pillage. The whole Christian quarter had been destroyed, and the Moslem population had taken refuge in the House of Abd-el-Kader, who had defended them against all comers. Upwards of 3000 Christians had been put to the sword by the Turks, and several hundred in the English Consulate, which as yet—being situated in the Moslem quarter—had escaped the flames. Upwards of 5000 Jews and Christians; it was calculated, had been murdered, all in cold blood; and the estimated loss of property, money, and goods, 1,000,000 sterling.

THE EUROPEAN CONCERT ON THE EASTERN QUESTION.

A Conference of the Ambassadors of the five great Powers on the affairs of Syria assembled at the Foreign Office in London at the Conference held on Monday, agreed upon drawing up a convention, containing six articles, and adopting the modifications desired by the Porte. An official note was addressed to the Turkish Government by the great Powers the Conference will reasonable in order to sign the convention.

Lord John Russell has authorised Lord Cowley to sign the convention for regulating the intervention in Syria, on condition that the four sequences of the Porte shall have been previously complied with; and it is asserted that Lord Cowley has also been instructed to make the reserve that the British Government cannot bind itself to sign present mission, and thus render the dispatch of foreign troops unnecessary, the Powers who signed the Treaty of Paris in 1856 shall confine themselves to supporting the influence of the Porte for the complete pacification of Syria, by maintaining in the Syrian waters such naval forces as will suffice for the safe residence of the Christian Consuls.

The Moniteur publishes a correspondence from Constantinople, dated the 18th ult., which states that Fuad Pasha, the Minister for Syria, sent the following message to the Marquis de Lavalette:—"Tell the Ambassador that, at the risk of my life, I shall wash out the stain upon the Ottoman name, and the culprits alone will also do their duty."

Great excitement prevails at St. Petersburg in consequence of the accounts from Syria. A despatch from St. Petersburg, dated Monday, says:—"A fleet is ready at Constatoh to make speedy sail for Syria, if circumstances require. The Grand Admiral, of 60 guns, newly made in America for the Russian Government, the Gromoboi, and the Olaf, of 90 guns, have the above fleet will be strengthened by three or four other Russian vessels now cruising in the Mediterranean.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Cape Parliament is still sitting. A liberal marriage law has been passed, which provides for valid marriages being contracted among the large Mohammedan population at the Cape. The Census Bill was rejected in the Upper House on the ground of expense. A proposal of peace has been made between Pretorius and Moshesh. A new magistrate is to be appointed on the borders between Winburg and Basutuland, who, with four men (two appointed by the Free State and two by Moshesh), is to form a court to adjudicate on all cases of cattle-stealing. Moshesh further engages to raise and maintain a police force of 300 men to assist the territories for the suppression and prevention of thieving. The measles had spread very widely throughout Capetown, especially about the higher portion.

Letters from Rome state that General Goyon will leave for France on the 5th inst.

A fire in the ninth ward of the city of New York has consumed thirty houses and twenty stables. The loss was estimated at over 100,000 dollars. Two firemen were injured.

The Emperor of Russia has prescribed a magnificent diamond ring to Mr. J. Ederheim, of the firm of J. Ederheim and Co., of St. Petersburg, agents of Messrs. Ransome and Sims, of Ipswich, as a token of approval of his exercise for the promotion of agriculture in Russia by the introduction of English agricultural machinery.

A large volume will be published, under the direction of the Astronomer Royal, of the records of the different astronomers of the Hornsbuys expedition.

A curious literary novelty is the production of a Bible which is bedecked after the fashion of the Post Office Directory—that is, on the fore edge—so that the desired spot can be opened at once.

A United States' paper gives a long account of a two-years' hunt of a Florida murderer, M'Closkil, who had fled to Texas. The constable, who had been on his trail during the greater part of that period, at last succeeded in arresting the criminal, who, subsequently trying to escape, was shot accidentally brought to bay with a pistol-shot, and finally secured with a secure wound.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) :—

SYRIA.—Constantinople, May 26 (via Trieste).—A great pinic has prevailed among the native owing to the approach of the Druses. Allied troops having been landed to keep the city, confidence is partially restored. The troops landed are chiefly French, and are employed only in consequence of the movements of the rebels.

HONG-KONG, June 2.—The steam-transport Assistance has been totally lost. All on board were saved.

SICILY.—Marsellles, Aug. 2.—News from Messina states that Garibaldi is preparing to send the Sicilian transport troops to the main land. The preparations have been witnessed by travellers.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON'S LETTER.

We are enabled to publish the following important letter from the Emperor Napoleon to the Ambassador of France at our Court, to which Lord John Russell referred on Tuesday night in the House of Commons :—

"SIR, COURT, July 25, 1860.

"My dear Persigny,—Affairs appear to me to be so complicated thanks to the inattentive excited everywhere since the war in Italy—that I write to you in the hope that a conversation, in perfect frankness, with Lord Palmerston, will materially assist in his entirely well. Dand Russell knows me, and when I affirm a thing he will believe me. Well! you can tell him that I am ready to keep the engagements I made at the peace of Villafranca I have had but one thought, one object—to inaugurate a new era of peace, and for that to put my own house in order, to pay debts, and especially with England. I had renounced Savoy and Nice; the extraordinary additions to Piedmont alone caused me to resume the desire to be annexed to France, and I consented reluctantly. But it will be objected—'You wish for peace, and you increase considerably the military power of France.' Mon cher ami, deux ne font ni trois ni quatre. My army and my fleet have in them nothing of a threatening character. My steam navy is even far from being adequate to our requirements, and the increase of our effective has not nearly equal that of sailing-ships deemed necessary in the time of King Louis Philippe. I have 400,000 men under arms, and, deducting from this amount 60,000 in Algeria, 6000 at Rome, 8000 in China, 20,000 guards and the 100,000 men who annually pass into the reserve—what is the truth—that my regiments are of smaller effective strength than during the preceding reign. The only addition to the army has been to create in the centre of France a military school of instruction, while wishing for peace, I desire also to organise the forces of the country on the best possible footing, for if of the last two foreigners have only seen the bright side, I myself have, close at hand, witnessed the defects, and I wish to remedy them. Having said thus much, I have, since Villafranca, neither the one or even the other of which people could shiem any one. When Lavalette started for Constantinople, the instructions I gave him were conformable with, and the best proof, effort to maintain the status quo; the interest of France is that Turkey should live at peace.

"Now, then, occur the massacres in Syria, and it is asserted that I am very glad to find a new occasion of making a little war, or of playing a new part. Assuredly people give me credit for too much common sense. If I imaginarily proposed an expedition it was because my feelings were, and the people of France are, the same as in Italy, and the intelligence from Syria transported me with indignation. My first thought, nevertheless, was to come to an understanding with England. What object could I have than that of humanity and that of the sending troops into that country? Could it be that the possession of it would increase my power? Could I demand from my people, as Augusta, notwithstanding its future advantages, is a source of weakness to France which for thirty years has devoted to it the purest of its blood and its gold? I said to Lord Cowley, and say openly to you, that I disapprove. I have great conquests to make, but only in France. Her interior organisation, developing the luxuriance of her resources, nevertheless have still immense progress to make. There a field exists vast enough for my ambition, and which will satisfy it.

"It was difficult for me to come to an understanding with England on the subject of Central Italy, because I was bound by the peace of Villafranca, and Northern Italy is my free creation. Nevertheless, I ask no better than a concert with England on this point, as on others; but, in Italy, I wish, by the annexations, to see placed at the head of the English Government lay aside petty jealousies, and follow my instincts.

"Let us understand one another in good faith, like honest men as we are, and not thieves who desire to cheat each other.

"To sum up in my innermost thought, I desire that Italy should obtain peace, no matter how, but without foreign intervention, and that a war should be able to quit Rome without compromising the security of the Pope. I could very much wish that I were free to undertake the Syrian expedition, and, in my case, not to make it alone; firstly, because it will be a great expense; and secondly, because I fear that this intervention may involve the Eastern question; but, on the other hand, I do not see how to resist public opinion in my country, which will never understand that we are not supporting not only the massacre of Christians, but the burning of our consulates, the insult to the flag and the pillage of the merchandise which were under our protection.

"I have told you all I think, without disguising or omitting anything. Make what use you may think advisable of my letter.

"Believe in my sincere friendship,

(Signed) "NAPOLEON."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

An engine put off the line on the London and Blackwall Railway, near the Haydon-square junction, on Tuesday morning, causing the whole of the line to be blocked. Many of the carriages were crushed, but the passengers escaped without injury.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 917 boys and 868 girls, in all 1785 children, were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59 the average number was 1594.—The deaths in the week were 1128, showing a rise in number of 10 over the previous week—i.e., 975. The deaths have not reached a thousand in any of the four weeks of July that have passed. The average number of deaths has been about 800 for the weeks corresponding with last week of the ten years 1850-59, and this, with the increase of population, is equivalent to 1000. The actual number returned is, therefore, less than the estimated amount by 251.

OUR ARMY IN CALCUTTA.—The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, in connection with a committee formed for the purpose, have co-operated in the good work of churchmen and as lovers of art, to aid them in their task of completing the interior of the cathedral commenced by Wren. It appears among two objects—the adornment of the church for Divine worship throughout its entire area, and the enriching of the library with a collection consisting of massive work, chiefly in bronze, and marble. We see by an advertisement in our columns that, to carry out this testimonial, the sum of £3000 is required. We are happy to state that the committee have succeeded in obtaining nearly enough for half of the sum they require—the £1,000 still required being a moderate sum when the great objects to be attained, and the importance of which it is borne in mind, that the appeal is made to the wealthiest community in the world.

MURDER OF FOUR PERSONS AT WALWORTH.—On Tuesday morning a man named William Corder, a journeyman carpenter, was brought before the magistrate at Lambeth, charged with having murdered his father, mother, and two brothers, at Walworth. The prisoner, who is a young man

LITERATURE.

TRAVELS IN THE REGIONS OF THE UPPER AND LOWER AMOOR: AND THE RUSSIAN ACQUISITIONS ON THE CONFINES OF INDIA AND CHINA. By Thomas William Atkinson, F.R.G.S., F.G.S. Hurst and Blackett.

The title of this book is so suggestive that it would be calculated to attract attention even if it did not bear with it the authority of a gentleman who, by a former work, "Oriental and Western Siberia," has established a claim to be reckoned high amongst those author-travellers who write with a purpose, and are enabled to fulfil all the requirements of the duty and character which they undertake. In his former work Mr. Atkinson's object was to introduce to the English reader scenes in a remote part of the globe of which no other descriptions were available. In the present volume the higher object of the author has also been attained—that, we think, with complete success—to attempt to produce the information of a more elevated character, intended to satisfy the wishes of the merchant, tradesman, ethnologist, and other scientific scholars, who naturally expect to find in an account of a new country materials likely to enable the circle of their legislative study, or to increase the truths on which it is founded. Possessing these qualifications, and with due consciousness, and a sense of the importance and comprehensiveness of the object which he undertook, he felt that there were also other demands to satisfy, and to them he has paid the same proper discrimination. With an eye to the expansion of our commerce, he has laid before the English public, with infinite pains and singular sagacity, a field in which he satisfactorily shows to be of almost incalculable extent, where enterprise, skill, and industry are sure to find a profitable investment.

It is probable that very great, if not the greatest, interest connected with the work will be derived from the information which it gives with regard to the position of Russia as bearing on our Indian empire and her existing relations with China. Referring to intelligence which has reached England from time to time in the last two or three years of Russian acquisitions in Central Asia, stretching far out towards the Himalayas, and in 1857 of that vast tract of country, the valley of the Amoor, said to have been ceded by the Emperor of China to the Emperor of Russia, Mr. Atkinson speaks in a modified tone of the apprehensions which have been felt with regard to the policy which has been pursued by our statesmen on the frontier of British India. He declares himself to be far from an alarmist, and, with the opportunities he has enjoyed of knowing the state and feeling of Russian society, he urges that he ought to be the last person to suggest the apprehension of evil from the accumulation of the elements of a predominating influence in the hands of the Russian Government. He will be is of opinion that the English statesman is perhaps justified in not shutting his eyes to the fact that Russian territory is now very nearly approached the possessions of Great Britain in India, and thinking that it may not be unreasonably expected that a Government which advances in the East at such a rate of progress may desire, sooner or later, to expand its territorial limits to the southward. To many persons in this country, he admits, the contingency may seem inevitable of a further stride across the Himalayas to Calcutta. Our author, however, somewhat more than insinuates that the statements which frequently appeared in the public prints, some of them having an apparent air of truth from the details set forth, have been written without a proper knowledge of the country, and have had no foundation in fact. He urges that even if such intentions as have been attributed to Russia were entertained by her, of which he says there is no proof, ample employment for many years to come will be found for the present enlightened ruler of that colossal empire, in the development of the resources of Russia on the vast steppes of Central Asia, in the region of the Amoor, and in the island of Karaga or Sagchalien, with its connections by steam and extensive coalfields; and in the establishment throughout those tracts of that civil and military system which will bring it into perfect harmony with Russia on the Dwina, Don, Oural, and the Volga.

However this may be, one thing is certain, that Mr. Atkinson, having passed several years exploring this remote portion of the globe, and having been the only European who has been permitted to enter the new Russian territory—as no modern geographer has published any minute description of these regions, as no recent traveller has penetrated its alleged interminable steppes and cyclopean mountain chains—in short, as it has been regarded as a terra incognita quite as much by the scientific as by less learned readers of the public are under every possible obligation to him for this detail of his wanderings in those enormous tracts of mountain, valley, and plain which Russia has added to her empire, and colonised with a warlike race. It is stated that this additional Russian territory extends over more than two thirds of her Southern Siberian frontier, which is about 6500 miles in length, commencing in the Caspian at 44 deg. lat. N., and 51 deg. long. E., and ending in 53 deg. lat. N., and 140 deg. long. E. Its most northern point is in 42 deg. lat. N., and 80 deg. long. E. The importance of such an increase of power to a State previously one of the most considerable of the Europeans. Russia must be understood to possess the sources of material prosperity which exist within these new provinces. This information the present work is intended to convey. The mineral wealth of incalculable amount, and agricultural produce in prodigious abundance, form but two items in the catalogue given of the adventures among the mountain Kirghis, the Manjours, Manyargs, Tcongouz, Tchoutchis, Toodzi, and Gelyaks, and the hunting and pastoral tribes. Mr. Atkinson's explorations commenced from the Siberian frontier and extended to the Lower Amoor. How full in details, and how agreeably lightened by anecdotes, by adventures and descriptions of scenery it is, we must leave the book itself to tell. When to this must be added the numerous pictorial illustrations, coloured and plain, the numerous landscape series taken from Mr. Atkinson's own drawings, and some characteristic portraits copied from a work recently published by the Russian Government, it is obvious that the interest and the value of the book cannot be overrated. The appendix is a manual of the natural history of those regions, and contains accounts of the mammalia, birds, trees, shrubs, and flowers of the valley of the Amoor; those of the Altai, Kirghis steppe, Kara-Tau, Ala-Tau, and Tarbagatai; of the mammalia and birds of the Trans-Baikal and Siberia; and of the trees, shrubs, and flowers found in Siberia and Mongolia.

Glancing at some of the salient points of the book, we find that the seizure of the Amoor by Russia was effected in this wise:—The Governor-General of Oriental Siberia determined to explore the Amoor, and in 1854 a great expedition was organised by him for that object. It was on such a scale that the Chinese could neither check his progress nor prevent him taking possession of the north bank of the river. In less than six weeks the whole of this vast region, including the country between the Amoor and the Russian frontier to the north of the Yablonoi, had changed masters; it had now fallen into strong hands, and before the end of the year the entire Chinese army could not have dislodged the small body of Cossacks placed in position. General Mouravieff had acted on all the points which his keen and practical experience told him were necessary for the security of the new acquisition. Russia has now got possession of the great watercourse, and the only one through which access from the sea to the vast plains and mountain districts of Central Asia can be obtained; the Lena, the Yenisey, and the Ob being sealed in the Arctic Ocean.

Russia has exercised great prudence in her conquests among the Asiatic tribes; she has always respected their religion and superstition, and no priests have accompanied her Cossacks. She has thus avoided the difficulties which other Powers have fallen into, when the soldier and the missionary have marched together. From our knowledge of Russia we believe it is impossible to make converts among them. These people we believe it is impossible to make converts among them. They are not like the Africans, who are but little more advanced in civilisation than the animals of their plains. The Asiatics are descended from a race of conquerors, and their traditions confirm the record of sages. Robbers they are; but neither pilferers nor pickpockets. Great hospitality, and a wild spirit of chivalry, still exist among them.

By this acquisition Russia has obtained a territory more valuable than all the supposed cotton districts of Africa, watered by hundreds of streams flowing into the great artery that passes through its entire length. The climate is good, and well suited for Europeans; its animals belong to both the cold and warm regions, while its luxuriant herbages and magnificent flora prove that the temperature is neither severe in winter nor excessively hot in summer. It is possible that some of these great plains may be suited for the culture of the cotton plant; if so, the production of this valuable product will, ere long, be found at the Russian ports in the Sea of Japan and in the Gulf of Tartary. Of the means of holding and the capability of the defence of the country we are told that after passing the settlement of Vait all the branches of the river are united in one stream near two miles in width, and varying from 100 to 200 feet in depth. This broad tide rolls on to Nicholaiskfa, the great defence of the Amoor. These works have been designed and constructed under the superintendence of engineer officers, and their armament would speedily stop any ships that attempted to enter, while the fleet would remain safely moored higher up the stream. The long winter here is a great detriment, and the place can never become a first-rate commercial port, as the ships will always be obliged to leave early. Frost approaches at the end of October or the first few days in November, and seals up the river, which for six months is one vast sheet of ice, and during a greater part of the seventh it is impossible for vessels to move from their moorings on account of the floating masses. So that five months in the only period during the year when this part of the Amoor can be used for commercial purposes. Bad as it is for ships to be frozen in at Greenland, it would be much worse at Nicholaiskfa; and this will prevent vessels of heavy tonnage, and check the development of the various resources of the country.

The Manjours are merchants from Elan-Khala, or Etcha-Khoton, on the Songuaria, carry on a considerable trade with the inhabitants of the Amoor. They descend the Songuaria in large boats, and enter the Chinese province, where they purchase horses, charging an enormous price. The goods they supply are coarsely-printed calicoes, Chinese silk materials, tea, and millet; also bracelets, earrings, tobacco, and brandy; for which they receive in exchange valuable furs, isinglass, and the dried spinal bones of the sturgeon—the latter are highly prized in Chinese cookery. The Mangoons from the Lower Amoor enter into this trade; they collect the furs from the hunters in every part of the region, and the other simple products from the people quite down to the Sea of Okhotsk. With these they ascend the river, bartering as they proceed, till they reach the Songuaria, and then ascend to Etcha-Khoton, exchange their commodities, and return with a Chinese cargo to their winter stations, where they remain till the following spring. So they pass their time, one voyage in the year realising enough for all their wants.

SCULPTURE : "CHASTITY," BY J. DURHAM, IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

Many Tatar merchants in Semipalatinsk are engaged in trade with the Chinese towns of Tchoubachack and Kuldja; also with Bokhara, Khokan, and Tashkend, between which and Semipalatinsk caravans are frequently passing. They take out printed Russian goods, copper, iron, and hardware, returning with tea, silks, and dried fruits, which are forwarded to the fair at Irbit and are then dispersed—the greater portion being sent into Siberia, the rest into Europe. The dwellings of the merchants engaged in this trade are commodious and clean, and the rooms contain a great deal of valuable property—in some rich carpets from Persia and Bokhara are hanging on the walls as well as spread on the floors,—in others they are piled up in bales. In another room are magnificent silks, shawls, and kalats (or dressing-gowns), beautifully embroidered and richly coloured silks. Ornamented and large vases in porcelain from China, tea services, plates, dishes, and similar works of art are also found in many houses; diamonds, emeralds, and a few other precious stones form parts of their stock in trade.

Numerous nomad tribes wander over the steppes on the banks of the northern branch of the Amoor; some are nestling at the edge of a dark forest, and look gay with their gardens around them. Others are placed amongst the rocks on the verge of the extensive tracts of pasture land that extend far into the interior.

> If industrious colonists are sent here they will find it better and easier to raise their crops than in the far west in America, where it takes years to clear even a small space; peasants are easily formed to their hands, where thousands of cattle would find food. Like the inhabitants of the waste plains of Asia, these people are attracted by gay colours; their fondness for them carries them into extravagance beyond that of the Kirghis, who seem to clothe their persons in "bright array," whereas the inhabitants of the Amoor paint all their household goods and portions of their dwellings with the most vivid tints, and, like the Chinese, possess an excellent knowledge of the harmony of colours.

As regards its scenery and fertility we learn that opposite to one of the large islands are the high volcanic cliffs of Sam-dou; they jut far into the river and stand out of the water like gigantic castles, quite in keeping with the vast flood at their feet. Several miles beyond this is another volcanic mass, Mo-dai-se, a picturesque group of rocks rising to a great height with deep recesses at intervals, which give the appearance of towers; the tops of some are split into turrets and pinnacles, that, when viewed at a distance, assume the character of an enormous Gothic structure. In some of the recesses clumps of elm and pine trees are growing, while in other parts birch and ash have taken root on the terraces, and their graceful foliage is seen waving in the breeze. This part of the Amoor, for a space of from forty to fifty miles, is not surpassed by any river scenery. Its great breadth, the numerous islands that seem floating on its surface, and the high cliffs that rise out of its bed, produce a series of grand and constantly-changing scenes. Shortly after passing Jong-ma the land on the right bank of the Amoor becomes better adapted for agriculture; meadow stretches along the shore, and broad tracts of pasture are seen in the distance. The change is made immediately obvious by the number of villages that are scattered about, and almost invariably beautiful situations have been chosen. Nature has been exceedingly bountiful in this region, and has bestowed on the people some of her most valuable gifts. Magnificent forests contain timber suited for every purpose, oak for shipbuilding, with elm, birch, and pine, for domestic purposes. She has stocked these vast forests with animals—many suited for the food of man, while others produce furs of great value, for which he can always find a market; and all multiply around him without giving him a moment's care. She has provided rich pastures for domestic animals, and the luxuriant vegetation which springs up everywhere shows that man need only scatter the seed into the earth to secure an abundant harvest, while the Amoor and its affluents afford an inexhaustible supply of various kinds of fish.

Of the region of the Upper Amoor we are told that it may be said, and with truth, that the country has charms for every class; the agriculturist and the grazier would look upon it with delight in anticipation of the crops and herds of fat cattle it would produce; the horticulturist would view its sloping hills, and think of the clusters hanging on his vines and the orange fruit which would crone in a country where the grape is indigenous; and the florist would be charmed with the variety and beauty of the flora; of the miner would scan the mountains and think of the mineral wealth they contain; and the sportsman could delight in the favourite pursuit in almost every kind of feathered and large game, from a woodcock to a tiger; while the lover of nature would gaze on the great stream and its accompanying scenes with admiration.

Among the quasi luxuries which Mr. Atkinson met with in "brick tea." As this is a beverage not generally known in the ladies of England, it may be useful to tell them how it is concocted. Brick tea is a solid mass about eleven inches long, six inches wide, and one inch and a half thick, and is made from the last gatherings and the refuse of the tea crop. Instead of being packed in chests, it is sold being pressed into a mould, when with bullocks' blood, and pressed into a mould, when the mass becomes more solid than a brick. When it is wanted it is taken out and chopped with hatchets; these are brushed between two stones, rubbed in the hands, and then thrown into the cauldron, a bowl of "sonjutka" (millet) is added, with a little salt, and a handful of millet meal; these ingredients are boiled for half an hour, and then served up hot. The landing at Vladivostok is about an hour, and then served up hot. The cauldron with a spoon, and thrown to the four winds as an offering to the gods. The beverage is neither bad nor particularly good, but is said being drunk.

We have lingered long over this book, beguiled by the interest which it excites, and, in absolute want of space to say more about it, whereas it is as nearly as possible all new, it is in every respect good.

"CHASTITY." BY J. DURHAM.

Mr. Durham is one of the hardworking enthusiastic band of sculptors who persevere in their art without encouragement. His contribution to which their art is subject in the cell assigned to it in the Royal Academy exhibition; and he has this year produced a little work, charming in intention, and of most elaborate and finished execution, which, despite the unfavourable position in which it was placed in the exhibition-rooms in Trafalgar-square, will be, on a first view, calculated to attract the attention of our subjects for engraving. Many a casual visitor to the Academy will, perhaps, have passed by the diminutive marble unnoticed, perched up as it is, at the back to the light on one side of the window, without noticing it; many who saw it and recognised its merit will have deemed it out of place in the very spot from which a decent view of it could be obtained. To see it—in the room, to judge of its merits—it must be taken down—a condition essential to the right enjoyment of a work of sculpture —was, from the very condition of its location, utterly out of the question. Under these circumstances, we think it not improbable that many will obtain a better idea of the peculiar character and merit of Mr. Durham's work from our Engraving than from the marble itself.

"Chastity" is here represented in a figure which, judging from the profile presented in the Engraving, has something Glottesque in the simple elegance of its outline and motive grace of its stately action, as it advances unabashed through a world of perils. The beautiful hands loosely joined before her, sustain a branch of lily—emblem of purity. The head, which is of classic form, is simply encircled with a fillet, with a bright star set in front. The drapery falls around in loose and easy folds, so displayed as just to show the onward motion without revealing the development of the outline of the figure.

We remark with pleasure that this beautiful production has been selected by the prize committee of the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts for the award of their prize medal in sculpture.

BUST OF VISCOUNT HARDINGE.

BY J. H. FOLEY, R.A.

THE sterling qualities of the late Viscount Hardinge, Commander-in-Chief, were highly esteemed by her Majesty, whose regard for the gallant veteran almost ripened into friendship. He was in attendance on her Majesty, as we all know, at the moment when he was seized with the sudden attack of indisposition which terminated fatally. Desirous to procure a memorial of this honest and high-minded public servant, the Queen could not have given the commission to better hands than those of Mr. Foley, who has produced a bust remarkable alike for the truth of the likeness and the simple dignity of the character displayed in it. This fine work of sculptured portraiture was in the Royal Academy Exhibition just closed, and is intended to be placed in the corridor at Windsor Castle.

BUST OF THE LATE VISCOUNT HARDINGE, BY J. H. FOLEY, IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

MR. BARKER'S PICTURE OF "THE RELIEF OF LUCKNOW."

THIS interesting historical picture still continues to attract throngs of curious admirers at the Gallery, 5, Waterloo-place, by whom the merit of the spirited delineation of that grand event, the meeting of Generals Havelock and Campbell beneath the walls of the rebel and now captured city, and the admirable arrangement of the picturesque site, are universally acknowledged. What attaches a peculiar and enduring value to this performance are the admirably truthful portraits of the heroes who took part in that memorable day, and which have all been prepared from materials obtained from actual sittings by Mr. Lundgren—amongst them those of Sir Colin Campbell (now Lord Clyde), General Outram, General Mansfield, Sir Hope Grant, Brigadier Russell, and the officers of their respective staffs, and, as a hideous set-off, one of that double traitor, Maun Sing. As an instance of the pains bestowed by the artist upon these important details, it may be mentioned that some exceptions having been taken by some of the family of General Havelock to some points in his portrait, as it originally appeared, it has since been repainted from materials supplied by them, and is now acknowledged by them to be perfectly accurate in feature and expression. We select an episode from this picture as a specimen of its varied contents and the artistic skill manifested in their treatment. It is that of a party of wounded on the extreme left of the picture, amongst whom is a brave soldier of the 93rd Regiment and a disabled camel, and behind them is a party of native soldiers quarrelling over their "loot" or plunder. Everybody who has seen anything of the Indian soldiery will recognise the truth of the last-mentioned incident.

BEYROUT.

BEYROUT, Beirout, or Bairut—the Berytus of the ancients—is a fortified seaport and commercial town of Syria, on a bay of the Mediterranean. It is situated fifty-seven miles N.N.W. from Damascus, of which city it is the port; and three miles south of Cape Beyrout. Its population has been variously estimated; one account fixing it at 12,000, whilst "Murray's Handbook to Syria" states it to be 45,000, of which one-third, it says, are Moslems, and the remainder Christians, Jews, and strangers. Its walls are three miles in circumference, outside of which are suburbs equalling the town in extent. The harbour, protected by a mole, is adapted only for small boats; but in the bay beyond it ships may anchor in from six to eleven fathoms. Beyrout was bombarded and taken by the English in 1840, the main object of the attack—the driving out of the troops of Ibrahim Pacha—having been soon accomplished.

During the late dreadful doings in Syria the greatest panic prevailed, as stated in this Journal, among the Maronite population at Beyrout, many of whom went to Alexandria, whilst nearly the whole of the Frank inhabitants took refuge on board the English, French, and Russian men-of-war in the roads. Beyrout, is just now doubly interesting as being a place of refuge for the persecuted Maronites, and as being also the point of debarkation for the French forces sent thither to protect the Maronites, if not to punish the Druses. We give, therefore, on the first page an Engraving of Beyrout and Mount Lebanon, from a drawing by Mr. J. Lewis Farley.

For the following particulars we are indebted to "Murray's Handbook of Syria and Palestine":—

"The situation of Beyrout is exceedingly beautiful, especially as viewed from the sea. The promontory on which it stands is triangular, the apex projecting some three miles into the Mediterranean, and the base running along the foot of Lebanon. The south-western side is wholly composed of loose drifting sand, and has all the aspect of a desert. The north-western side is totally different. The shore line is formed of a range of irregular, deeply-indented rocks and cliffs, worn into a thousand fantastic forms by the waves. Here deep, gloomy caverns, into which the waters roll with a roar as of distant thunder; there jagged and isolated rocks and bold precipices, around which the white surf plays like a thing of life, sending up showers of spray that sparkle like diamonds in the bright sunlight. Behind these rocks the ground rises gradually for a mile or more, when it attains the height of about two hundred feet. In the middle of the shore-line stands the city—first a dense nucleus of buildings surrounded by an old tottering wall; then a broad zebula of picturesque villas, embowered in rich foliage, running up to the very summit of the heights, and extending far to the right and left. Beyond these are the mulberry groves covering the whole acclivities, and variegated here and there by a few graceful palms and dark cypresses.

"The old town stands on the very beach, and often during a northerly gale gets more of the sea-water than is agreeable. The little port, now in a great measure filled up, lies between a projecting cliff and a ruinous insulated tower, called Burj Fauzar, which bears, like the rest of the fortifications, many a mark of British bullets. The walls of the town were never strong, and are of no use at the present day, except as impediments to commerce, for which beneficent object the Turks seem inclined to keep them up. The streets are narrow, gloomy, dirty, and badly paved; and so steep and tortuous withal that almost every bale and package landed at the custom-house has to be carried off on the backs of men! The houses are substantially built of stone; and a few of the villas in the suburbs possess some little pretensions to architectural effect, though it must be admitted the Beyroutines do not excel in this branch of the arts. The view commanded by the higher houses is truly magnificent, embracing the Bay of St. George, the indented coast, retiring, promontory on promontory, till lost in the distance; and the noble ridge of Lebanon, with its wild glens, and dark pine-forests, and clustering villages, and castle-like convents, and snow-capped peaks, on which the clouds sleep.

"The antiquities in and around Beyrout are few and of little interest. A number of columns of grey granite, forming the foundations of the little quay; three others, apparently in situ, within the south-eastern gate, and several on the open space without it; some foundations, pieces of tesselated pavement, and excavations in the rock, probably the remains of baths, half a mile along the shore to the westward; a group of sarcophagi about the middle of the south-western shore of the promontory; and the ruins of an aqueduct at the base of the mountains on the east, which once brought a supply of pure water from the Nahr Beyrout to the city—such is about a complete list of the antiquities. Almost every year shows that there are many others, far more important, buried beneath the soil and rubbish. Old tombs are frequently laid open by excavation, containing sarcophagi of pottery."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1860.

HIS Imperial Majesty of France has been pleased to write to his Ambassador here a "private" letter for communication to our Foreign Secretary and to England generally. The Emperor expresses himself as most earnestly desirous to remove the unpleasant state of feeling which he confesses exists between us and Europe in reference to the designs of France. "Lord Palmerston," his Majesty touchingly says, "knows me, and what I say he will believe." Our ally assures us solemnly that he has great conquests to make, but that they are in France only; that his armaments are not directed against us; and that he will really after abandoning his original claims to them, and only because they grate extension of the power of Piedmont made it necessary for France to have a better frontier; and that his wishes the policy of England and France to be identical. The letter reads very pleasantly; but in spite of Mr. Hadfield it will produce no alteration in Lord Palmerston's plans for fortification. Indeed, it is due to our ally that we should make ourselves as strong as we can, in order to be worthy to be associated with such a power as France in her mission for the peaceful enfranchisement of Europe. And we shall be the better able to aid her in all her generous efforts if we feel that we have nothing upon our minds, no misgivings as to our own position. Such a letter as that of Napoleon, which must be truly gratifying to every confiding person, makes it doubly incumbent upon us to show ourselves worthy of the glorious alliance to which he invites, and so let us go on with our fortifications. In the meantime Lord John Russell has given his assent to the proposal for a convention on the Eastern crisis, upon which the Emperor says that he enters unwillingly, but that he is impelled thereto by natural indignation at the atrocities which have been committed in Syria. He here drops an expression which may as well be noted, coming from one who, like "Apollo's oracle, never speaks in vain." The Emperor says that his intervention may bring on complications of the Eastern question. If it should be found hereafter that the French in Jerusalem are like the French in Rome, "both to depart," we must not say that we had not due warning.

There was more foundation for the statement that Garibaldi had been wounded than is generally the case in reference to the Neapolitan telegram. He had been personally engaged at Melazzo, and had been in actual single combat with a cavalry officer, whom Garibaldi cut down. About the same time a gun opened upon his party, and a shell burst in the midst of the hero's escape was most providential. The Neapolitans, being in great force, made a strong stand at Messina, but were driven in with much slaughter; and it is since stated that a sort of armistice has been concluded between the Dictator and the King's General. It cannot be supposed that the former will long tolerate the presence of the Neapolitans in a corner of Sicily, and we presume it is expected that negotiations for the entire evacuation of the island will be carried out. All the desistance which the liberality of Englishmen can afford to Garibaldi should be sent to him at this time, when it is most valuable, inasmuch as he wants the heavier materials of war, which can be obtained only by means of hard money. All the generous enthusiasm of all Italy will not cast Armstrong guns or fill thirteen-inch shells; and these are the arms which he now wants.

Lord Palmerston's fortification plan, and the encouragement afforded to the volunteer movement, have set the "regular" military authorities on their mettle, and they have issued a manifesto which is in every way creditable to them, whether their views can be adopted or not. They insist upon it that we are not doing enough, and that there ought to be considerable additions to the regular Army, whose garrison work they do not believe that the volunteers can be taught to do. After the spectacles which were afforded in the Park and at Wimbledon we will be diffident to persuade the country that there is anything in the soldier's duty which the intelligent volunteer cannot and will not learn; and, however natural may be the professional desire for "more soldiers," we are disposed to believe that the numbers will not be supported, perhaps, in any attempt to do much more than is announced as in contemplation. The Army and Navy Gazette, however, states that a certain increase in the regular forces is in progress, and, should strong necessity seem likely to arise, there need be no limit to our military enlistment.

Parliament, being now well into August, is meditating on how it is to be prorogued; but Lord Palmerston sits as steadily as Theseus, and declares that he will sit till Christmas rather than rise until the Indian Army Bill and some other measures of importance shall have been got through. The show at the end of the Session will not be the brilliant one, but the list of dead measures will testify to the fact that the Government "intended" a great deal; and it used to be said of Mr. Pitt that many of the pensions he gave were "for services intended to be done to the country." Rumours of Ministerial changes are premature, but it is quite on the cards that certain leading men may be relieved of their up their business with intention to retire at an early opportunity.

THE COURT.

THE Queen and the Prince Consort, with Princess Alice and other members of the Royal family, left Windsor Castle on Saturday, in excellent health and spirits. Her Majesty has determined to perform the journey from London to Edinburgh during the night, following the example set by the Prince Consort in his first adoption this innovation on the ordinary mode of travelling.

The usual dinner took file to the senators and members of the Royal yachts; the detachment of infantry stationed at East Cowes, the labourers and workmen employed on the Osborne estate, and the "coast-guard and Trinity House men of the district, took place on Friday o'nsight. Several large tents were erected on the lawn, beneath which the dinner was laid out for about 500 persons. At three o'clock the whole of the party invited marched in procession to the Horse-shoe Lawn, preceded by the band of the Royal Marines and the 1st battalion of the 18th Regiment. The Queen and Prince, with the Royal family and the visitors staying at Osborne, followed, and the general gentleness in writing, having cast the procession pass, went to the raised seat in front of the colonnade, where the usual loyal toasts were commenced. At half-past four dancing and rustic games took place. A tent was erected on the lawn for the Prince Consort, and the Royal family, and half-past seven o'clock the bands played "God Save the Queen," her Majesty and the Royal and the Osborne guests, and the "coast-guard and Trinity House men of the district, took place on Friday o'nsight. THE VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES TO NORTH AMERICA.—THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE, CHARLOTTE TOWN, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

LETTERS from Canada describe the eager preparations making all through the country for the reception of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The correspondent of the Times writes as follows from Montreal, July 12:—

"I have penetrated thus far in my search for the first landing-place of the Prince of Wales, crossing in my tour at all points artists and correspondents innumerable from the American newspapers, all busy, in eager haste to strike upon the first tracks of English Royalty. Writing next day from Quebec he adds:—"I have at last, through the kindness and courtesy of Mr. Rose, got the clue through the labyrinth of visits and progresses which his Royal Highness will make during his stay in these provinces. It has not been long decided on, and, allowing for the difference of a day sooner or later in his arrival at Newfoundland, it will be observed accurately throughout. The squadron, with his Royal Highness and suite, is expected at St. John's, Newfoundland, about the 23rd. Here, while the vessels coal, the Prince pays a short visit to St. John's. On the following day the squadron sails for the Bay of Fiction, about forty miles north of Halifax, where the Prince disembarks and proceeds by rail and carriage across the country to Halifax. Already a great gathering of Mayors and civic dignitaries is assembling there to meet him with becoming state and ceremonial. After a stay of nearly two days at Halifax he proceeds by land to Fredericktcn, and thence to St. John, New Brunswick, stopping at each place a whole day at least. He again embarks on board the Hero, and visits Charlotte Town, the capital of Prince Edward Island, where he remains the greater part of two days (see Illustration). From Prince Edward Island he proceeds with the fleet to Gaspe Bay, at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, where the Governor-General of Canada, Lord Lyons, the Minister to Washington, and the chief members of the Canadian Government proceed by sea to receive him. Thence he comes by the St. Lawrence to the mouth of the Saguenay River, up which he will steam for the best part of a day, to see the wild and sombre magnificence of its rocky shores. From the Saguenay he comes straight to Quebec, where he is expected to arrive about the 12th of August (see Illustration). He will, it is believed, remain at Quebec at least two days, during which time there will be a ball and levée. His Royal Highness will also visit the falls of Montmorenci, and the still more beautiful and extraordinary rocks called the Natural Steps, above that cataract. If there is time he will visit the falls of St. Anne, which, always excepting Niagara, are considered the finest and most beautiful in America. He will leave Quebec on the evening of the 18th or 19th, and so, through the care of the Colonial Government, the best of the St. Lawrence has during the last few years been much the best of the St. Lawrence. In the Arrow or the Fairbairn, as he may decspend, he will be able to proceed in the Arrow or Fairbairn as he anchors for the night almost thirty miles below that city, whereas a fleet of river steamers, with visitors, has been arranged to go out and meet him. At Montreal he remains some days, one day being devoted to opening the Exhibition of Arts and Manufactures, another to opening the Victoria Bridge. On other days there will be levées, banquets, and balls. From Montreal he proceeds through the Province of Canada, and two days are set apart for riding out privately (if possible), and leaving the fine scenery round Montreal. Fifteen miles of the leaves have already been provided for the Prince and his suite for this purpose. Two days are also devoted to a visit to Ottawa, to show their guests of the chief Indian tribes in their canoes, to show their guests of the strength and skill of the Canadian Indian boatmen, and obeisance. From Kingston he visits London for a day, and also Brantford, and so on to Hamilton, where he rests for a few days, and himself makes an Agricultural Exhibition of Upper Canada. While here he will make excursion up the Lake of the Thousand Isles. His next visit will be to the Bay of Quinte, where he joins the Grand Trunk Railway at Toronto, and, after a short visit to Niagara, he is expected, for four days or more. While here he makes an excursion to Lake Simcoe, and to Collingwood, on the shore of Lake Huron. From there he leaves to Sarnia, near Lake Huron, where there will be a large muster of the chief Indian tribes in their canoes, to show their powers of strength and skill and their loyalty and obeisance. From Port Sarnia he visits London for a day, and also Brantford, and so on to Hamilton, where he rests for a few days, and himself makes an Agricultural Exhibition of Upper Canada. While here he will make excursion up the Lake of the Thousand Isles. His next visit will be to the Bay of Quinte, where he joins the Grand Trunk Railway at Toronto, and, after a short visit to Niagara, and there he will remain probably for a week. This tour will occupy altogether to the end of October. The beginning of October will enter into his arrangements after that are not yet unknown, though it is now supposed to be certain that he will visit both the Canadas and the New York. The route to the former city is most likely to be from the neighborhood of Niagara to Saratoga by rail, and thence by the horses' road to Albany, and thence by Whitehall to the Lakes George and Champlain, and back from Whitehall to Albany and Washington. From Washington he will proceed on Baron Renfrew, and from Boston, where it is anticipated he will remain for a few days. The port of his departure has not yet been fixed. The date is not known. He will be honoured by his Royal Highness's presence during his brief stay in that dependency of the British Crown. Charlotte Town, the capital of Prince Edward Island, is situated on the northern shore of the south coast, with a good harbour. Its population is about 4000; and its principal structures are the government, episcopal, and other churches, several chapels, the barracks, and a fort. It has an irrofoundry and a manufactory of coarse woollens. George Dundas, Esq., is the Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island.

Quebec will also be visited by his Royal Highness, and we give an Engraving of that city. Assembled in Quebec is the flower of the entire military force of Canada, as well as detail, it must at all times possess a peculiar interest. On its forts, and casemates, and bastions, possess a peculiar interest. On its forts, and casemates, and bastions, some of the sons of Great Britain and Ireland, America and France, have fallen, and around its citadel stands one of the most daring exploits from a British point of view, as well as from a military point of view. Quebec has not inappropriately been called the "Gibraltar of America." Like the name of the hero of the Plains of Abraham, Montgomery must ever remain connected. The citadel stands on what is called Cape Diamond, three hundred and fifty feet above the level of the sea, and commands the harbour and river. It is by far the strongest citadel is of the most picturesque and grand character. There will be seen the mighty St. Lawrence, winding its course for many hundred miles, whilst the background of the panoramic scene is filled up by extensive plains, running backwards to lofty mountains. In the foreground, extensive plains, running backwards to lofty mountains. In the foreground, with Point Levi opposite and the Island of Orleans in the distance, whilst the junction of the River St. Charles and the Great River form that noble expanse of water, which in numerous parts is of the ocean riding at anchor during the summer season. A walk around the ramparts of Quebec will occupy the stranger for an hour, the constant change of scene at every turn he takes. The city itself bears all the resemblance of a strongly fortified and ancient city, and, in that respect, is unlike any from the newly sprung-up towns of America. The streets are generally narrow, and in some parts very steep, in walking from the Lower to Upper Town. The Lower Town or the Port Town is where all the shipping business of the port is carried on, chiefly lumber—in export—and every description of goods—in import. At Quebec the portion of the immense lumber district of the Ottawa finds a market; vessels coming to Quebec in ballast and cargo return with it. Quebec is the chief mart of the timber trade. The population of Quebec is largely infused with French Canadians, and in passing along its streets scarcely anything but the French tongue is heard. Founded upon a rock, and in its highest parts overlooking a great extent of country—between 300 and 400 miles from the ocean—in the midst of a great continent, and yet displaying fleets of foreign merchantmen in its fine capacious bay, and showing all the bustle of a crowded seaport town, Quebec presents one of the most rare of the known almost mountainous declivities—situated in the latitude of the finest parts of Europe, exhibiting in its environs the beauty of a European capital, yet in winter assuming the cold of Siberia, governed by a people of different language and habits from the mass of the population, dressed in military uniform, in the midst of civilians without taxes, and in the full enjoyment of every privilege, civil and religious—such are the prominent features which strike a stranger in the city of Quebec.

THE GREAT EASTERN "AT NEW YORK.—The total number of visitors to the Great Eastern on the occasion of the 4th of July has not been 45,749. The ship has been thirteen days on exhibition; of these six were Sundays, on which no admission fee was charged, and the receipts were 8575. During the seven days of the realised price at half a dollar the visitors have been 37,174, and the receipts, at that rate, 18,587 dols., or £3,718, 8s6d; and on the 17th, 4694. The total receipts on the thirteen days have amounted to £7,436, 16s. It is stated that the Mayor of the city of New York and Philadelphia have passed a resolution inviting the directors to send the ship to the latter city on her departure from this country. It is understood that she would be closed to the public on the 26th of July, and that she will take her place in the line of Ocean Steamers on the return to England. Previous to her final departure she will make an excursion to Cape May with a limited number of passengers, at 50 dollars per passage. It is expected that a large number of persons will take passage by her to Europe.

THE CHINA EXPEDITION.—All the accounts which have been received from China concur in representing everything as going on as well as possible as regards the health of the troops. The whole of the force is represented to be, with the exception of the siege-train, and there was at hand a small siege-train, sufficient to operate with until the arrival. The troops are in excellent health, good health, excellent spirits, and, from the Generals downwards, full of confidence in success. The expedition was always looked upon in China as the state of our affairs there appeared to be considerable doubt as to the French being ready in time. Indeed, the accounts of the political inferiority of the state of our allies are not calculated to sustain their boasted superiority in organisation. They had not been for the presence of the commissariat, and very few carriage animals for stores, &c. We understand that no offer made by Sir Hope Grant of a number of ponies was at first accepted by General Montauban, but afterwards rejected on the score of their expense, which was no more than that at which they had been supplied to the British Army. Let us hope it will not in our allies expecting us to supply there deficiencies which it is their pride to say they experience generally to a much less extent than ourselves.—Army and Navy Gazette.

THE MONITEUR from 1789 to 1799, containing invaluable materials for the history of the French Revolution, is being republished in Paris. There are not 300 persons in France," says the publisher, "who possess a set of the original Moniteur, while there are more than 20,000 who have unlawfully, but vainly, desired to possess one."

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

A REVIEW of the recent proceedings in the House of Commons is but a sorry task. We have been accustomed to shudder at scenes of violence in the American Congress, and we have been able hitherto to say, with soothing of the pride of the Phariseo, at our own representative assembly is a body of gentlemen. It is very much to be doubted if we can say so any longer. There have been exhibitions of temper, disorder, bad feeling, and disregard of all the decent conventionalities which constitute a conduct of public business in this country, which would not have been tolerated at any debating society at any Magpie and Stump or any Three Pigeons in the kingdom. The ex, Secretary and ex-Under-Secretary for India, the Attorney-General, Secretary and ex-Under-Secretary for India, the Attorney-General, Sir Cornewall Lewis—but it is of no use dallying with language or mincing phrases to express that, to give an idea of which one must borrow from the spirit, the tone, and the vocabulary of the actors in the disgraceful scenes which have taken place in the House of Commons these were it not that indignation is the paramount feeling. There is one test by which the character of the deportment of members of such may be tried by those who are conversant with Parliamentary habits and customs—the Speaker has been obliged to interfere in a manner and with a decision which has been seldom witnessed and which, coming from the public himself, is of more importance nowadays than ever, carries with it a significancy and an importance which cannot be unheeded. The present Speaker, with many qualifications for his office, is certainly wanting in that force of demeanour, that "aplomb," so to speak, which is calculated to exercise a silent influence and to impress with a dignified authority which renders a recourse to the action of his unnecessary. His voice is not full, nor his gesticulation commanding, nor his look awe-inspiring, and his manner gives an idea of timidity which very probably does not, in fact, belong to him. But, in short, his position requires that he should be more than he is surrounded by such an atmosphere of what, to coin a word, we may call Great-Jove-on-his-throne-ness, as to warn by his look the offender that he is not to be by a nod. Unfortunately novel, state of things when the Speaker of the House of Commons has to depend for his authority and dignity on the support that his indirect authority has been inadequate to quell coarse and perhaps the most disregard of the rules of that assembly, and to ask for the aid of the House to restore order and decorum, but to shield himself from personal offence and insult. And be it understood that all this has arisen not from the violence of an important member newly transplanted from the noisy regions of a babbling vestry nor of an untutored representative of a remote colonial western or eastern shore where men may become rich enough to represent a constituency without having acquired with their local acquisitions the habits of a gentleman, but from having been toned down to the usages or manners of good breeding; nor of a wild young Irish Member, but from members of the most renowned British deputy from the Isle of Mull; but by the deliberate, cold passion and rancour of at least one gentleman by birth and education entitled to be called a gentleman, who has sat in Parliament for twenty-five years, has held office more or less high, and holds at present a post which, if it does not, ought to, confer on him a certain quasi-judicial character. Such a gentleman is not to be easily roused, much can systematically so conduct himself as to educe more than one direct rebuke from the Speaker, supported by the House, and who yet can acquiesce in the censure of the House, and, on occasions, when the House was in Committee, to make a personal attack on him for having done that which he was very near doing himself. Gentlemen will remember that, in a debate, less than commensurate with the extent and scope of the duty of the official who presides over the proceedings of that body which is the source for their existence, during the last assembly of gentlemen in the world.

The whole question of the practical existence of insubordination ought it to be omitted that support and countenance have been given indirectly by cheer and gesture (and how fraught is the latter with significancy) to the conduct of those gestures are only those who watch, then closely can tell) from another ex-Secretary who is remarkable for a kind of wild and fitful eccentricity—a gentleman who, though full of doubtful jokes and trite quotations, produced as if they had been that moment thought of, and who sometimes is to be found drawn in a measure of the boatswain and the trooper. This gentleman is quite as willing to wound as the other offender, whom we have endeavoured to describe, but he is more open in his strike, because, as an office may not be so hopeless as to the other, who could not by possibility be included in the category of gentlemen. Such a state of things cannot be formed, and who certainly as he lives will not be a member of the next Parliament. But little can be done with this and parties, and the House, as a body, is not to be made out of the system of obstruction which has been adopted by half a dozen members. The House has, indeed, in the case of Mr. Gregory, passed a measure which the majority of the House has accepted from the first. There seems to be only one remedy for the evil in the case of Mr. Gregory, and that is, that he declared to be the duty of the Secretary to the Treasury and those other Government officials who compose the "working staff" of the House to strike, because of the gross contempt so conducting himself as to be beyond the control of the ordinary rules of the House, and to be guilty of a breach of privilege of these tumultuous occasions (for it ought to be understood that the scenes that have been alluded to have been going on night after night), and that was a proposition which, if carried, would have come to pass on the ex-Under-Secretary to be told whether he was speaking to the original proposition or not. But the proposition was lost. We think the honourable gentleman ought to know better than I can do what question he is addressing himself."

Although it is not easy to keep to that topic, inasmuch as it comprises almost the whole of the Parliamentary features of the past six or seven days, we must, nevertheless, endeavour to do so. One of the most serious characteristics of the period over which this sketchy chronicle extends is may be said that further symptoms of the "Palmerston" of the Minister were not more than one night—on Friday, that evening when the Parliamentary banquet is composed of all the sorts and cede and grades of the House, and when the Ministerialists, the members many and sundry—Mr. Disraeli forced an occasion to make a desk-blows and speech. And how, be it remembered, the occasion on which the present Minister had assumed office, and in somewhat verbose and tautological fashion spun out that theme into the dimensions of a speech of an hour and a half's length. It was on this address, which was really very far from apropos to the question before the House, namely, a vote of thanks to Lord Elgin, that late night, the Speaker, roused at last into activity, complained of the abuse of the privilege of bringing forward all sorts of subjects on the motion for an adjournment of the House, which, on the present occasion, was more gross than ever, for the prescribed business of the night was not reached until after one o'clock in the morning, and that the House members tribe with this in itself useful institution, take one subject which was brought forward by a gentleman who is notorious—A gentleman who is noted for a kind of flinty, gritty fluency, and for a habit of passing strictures on every measure and every man in the House, as a tone, which is by no means to be caustic, but which is only insolent, had given notice that he would call the attention of the House to the power in the Government to deal with foreigners of suspicious character in this country. It was conjectured that he intended an onslaught on those disturbers of the public peace, Mazzini-ghosts; but, to and behold! it turned out that he was only pregnant with a huge pistol-grenade—a letter of the Emperor Napoleon's position of this country in the first place, and in the second of the probability that there was an organised plan among the detainees in Portland Square to cut the wires of the telegraphs and break up the permanent way of the railroads at the moment that their compatriots had landed on our shores. Well, if there be any adherents of the present dynasty of France in the charming district of London in question, here is a brilliant idea suggested to them by a member of the British Parliament. It is this frightful tendency to talk about anything and everything in Parliament—to make the House of Commons the arbitrator and the court of appeal in every petty question, and in every personal and local affair that can be gossiped over in a club or a coffee-house, that has given rise to a peg whereon to hang a speech—which has brought the Legislature into a condition this year which would be ludicrous if it were not detrimental and dangerous. Positively, there is now among the notices of motions before the House of Commons one for leave to bring in a bill "to provide for the destruction of certain weeds in India." Ye Powers! cannot Irish weeds be destroyed without an Act of Parliament?

The fact is, our Parliament is struggling with the weight of overlegislation, and it is in vain for sensible, quiet members like Mr. Ewart to bring forward motions to regulate and shorten the proceedings and curtail the loquacity which has degenerated into garrulity of the House. What a practical comment on such a motion was an Immediate "count out," probably the last of the Session!

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

THE ROMAN STATES.—The MARQUIS OF NORMANBY moved for copies or extracts from the Minutes of the Council of Ministers of the 1st March, 1859, 1856, and 1857, referring to the condition and administration of the Roman States, stating his object to be to expose the information already produced as to his own conduct and that of Mr. Lyons in their communications with His Papal Government.—The motion was seconded by Lord WODEHOUSE, and agreed to.

CIVIL LISTS.—LORD ST. LEONARDS called attention to the state of the law as regards adverse possession against the Crown and the Duchy of Cornwall, and moved a Select Committee to inquire into the matter.—The LORD CHANCELLOR expressed his willingness to concur in any alteration of the law which would conduce to the public welfare.

The Court of Africa Act Amendment Bill, the Crown Debts and Judgments Bill, the Indian Stock Dividends, Stock and Improvement Bill, the Prisons (Scotland) Bill, the Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Bill, the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill, the Registration of Births, &c. (Scotland) Bill, the Police and Town Improvement (Scotland) Bill, and the County Coroners Bill, severally passed through Committee.

The Registration of Births, &c. (Scotland), Bill; the Highways (South Wales) Bill; the Manchester Improvement Bill; the Felony Punishment Amendment Bill, the Postage (Army and Navy) Bill, the Medical Act (1858) Amendment Bill, and the Highway Rates Continuance Bill, were severally read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

SYRIA.—In answer to Mr. R. OSBORNE, Mr. RUSSELL said that a proposition was made sometime ago that a commission should be sent to Syria, some of the members of which should be selected by the Porte. Lord Dufferin had been instructed to proceed to Syria to form part of that commission on the part of Great Britain. There would be about six on the part of the Sultan and Marlin at Beyrout.—In answer to Sir J. Fergusson, Lord J. RUSSELL said that the idea of sending a commission to Syria was one that was not determined on. reference would be held that duty which would decide the exact course to be taken.—In answer to Sir C. Napier and Sir Dr Lacy Evans, Lord J. RUSSELL said that Lord Dufferin had been to Syria, and was acquainted with the people and the country. There was no intention of sending British troops to Syria.

THE GRAVES AT SEBASTOPOL.—In answer to Mr. H. Seymour, Lord J. RUSSELL said that there were no intentions at present for appointing a fit and a fixed salary to watch the graves of the British at Sebastopol, and he believed there would be no occasion for any measure by the Government for which had expressed itself in a very satisfactory manner on the subject.

THE CIVIL LISTS.—Mr. LABOUCHERE moved for a select committee into committee on the European Forces (India) Bill was about to be resumed, when Mr. GENERAL PEEL rose to move the appointment of a Select Committee for the attempting to put a question to Lord Palmerston after the order of the day had been put, moved an amendment for the appointment of a Select, for the purpose of calling attention to the state of the business of the House, proceeding against Mr. Gregory, and the state of the business of the House of the fortifications, and asked that some day should be positively fixed for that consideration.—Lord PALMERSTON said there were no intentions of any change of the right hon. gentleman's proceedings.—Lord PALMERSTON said that he was most anxious that the question of fortifications should be brought forward. subject of the Indian Army was first in order, and he asked Mr. Hadfield to withdraw his motion, as all of the system of obstruction which had been used to delay the latter subject.

EUROPEAN FORCES (INDIA) BILL.

MR. H. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD moved that the European Forces (India) Bill, the point being Mr. Milne's instruction to the Committee that all military powers of the Government should be reserved to the Governor-General, which he supported.

Mr. C. FORTESCUE also supported the motion.

Sir C. WOOD urged that there was not a word in the proposed bill which altered any power which the Crown now had under the Government of India, authorities in India with regard to military appointments, and the instruction" to the whole question.

Mr. RICH, though opposed to the measure, yet thought the proposed amendment was one which would limit rather than extend the power of the Crown.

Sir B. COLEBROOKE joined in this appeal, and urged a direct course against the motion.

The motion was then negatived.

Sir J. FERGUSSON moved that in the opinion of the House it is inexpedient to proceed further with legislation respecting European troops in India, until the House has had an opportunity of considering the state of the military force of that country shall have been submitted to the consideration of Parliament. He urged that the Indian Army was a large and powerful body of the local Indian army in all its bearings, arguing strongly against the proposition of the bill.

Mr. T. BAINES seconded the motion.

A division was then taken, and the motion was rejected by 88 to 59.

Sir J. EDMUNSTONE moved the adjournment of the House, for the purpose of moving a vote of censure on Lord Palmerston.

Sir B. COLEBROOKE hoped that the opposition to the bill would be earnestly continued at the present time.

Sir H. WILLOUGHBY also took the opportunity of delivering a lengthy speech against the measure, and condemning the local forces in India.

Lord PALMERSTON said he spoke to the question before the House, that of the adjournment, and declared that the characteristic obstructive course taken by the opponents of the measure as unconstitutional, the proceeding being that of a minority of the House, and not to be tolerated by the House. Every day the Act of the 21st and 22nd years of the Queen, c. cvi., secs. 55, 66, and 68, respectively, allowed the Government to propose the bill for the reorganisation of the Indian Army, anything in this Act contained notwithstanding.

Mr. T. BAINES moved that the Speaker do leave the chair, which motion the pensions secured to the military forces in India; but he was willing to accept the addition because it would be the intention of keeping faith with the offices of the Indian Army.

Mr. C. FORTESCUE was in favour of and agreed to.

It having been proposed to take the report this day and the third reading on Thursday,

Mr. HORSMAN objected, and took occasion to complain of the conduct of the Government in the matter of Parliamentary discussions by the time of putting the question.

Sir G. GREY complained of the hon. member impugning the conduct of the Speaker in his absence.

Mr. HORSMAN explained in his accusation against the Speaker.

Mr. B. OSBORNE urged that there should be a definite time fixed for the discussion on the Indian Bill.

The House then resumed.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Senior Member of Council (India) Bill, the Superannuation Act Amendment Bill, and the Admiralty Jurisdiction (Ireland) Bill were read a third time and passed.

The East India Stock Transfer, &c., Bill passed through Committee.

On the motion for the House going into Committee on the Bill, Mr. GRIFFITH moved a clause the effect of which was to deprive the Commissioners of the power of making any order for the execution of the scheme proposed. On a division the clause was rejected by 292 to 68.—Mr. ANSTEY moved a clause to prevent the Commissioners of Church property situate in the metropolis or any other city or town in the north of Scotland from being disposed of, but the Chairman ruled the motion out of order.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The following bills passed through Committee:—Militia, Metropolitan Police Force (Dockyards), Hereditable Securities, &c. (Scotland), Turnpike Acts Continuance, Maynooth College, Bank of Ireland (No. 2), Weights and Measures (Ireland), Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland), Local Government Act (1858) Amendment, Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment, Copyhold and Inclosure Commissioners, &c., Turnpike Trusts Arrangements, Railways Act (Ireland) (1851) Amendment, Game Certificates, &c., Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Act Amendment.

The Militia Ballot Bill was read a second time.

The Lunacy Regulation Amendment, the Herring Fisheries (Scotland), the Tithes to Land (Scotland), the Party Emblems, and the New Zealand Bills were read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE TAXPAYER DUTIES.—At the sitting of the CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, in reference to the resolution on the import duty on paper, that he should propose to substitute—the authorising a reduction of duty that he should propose to be levied in this country, in conformity with the equivalent to the cattle from France, or other making the same duty payable on all foreign cattle.

SAVINGS BANKS.—The Savings Banks and Privately Societies Investment Bill was referred to a Committee, having been reduced to the 4th and 11th clauses.

RETIREMENT-ROOMS.—The Bill for the sale to the Committee of the Retirement-rooms at the Royal and Wine Licences (Ireland) Bill, and clauses up to the 8th were passed.

EAST INDIA QUESTIONS WITH THE FRENCH.—At the evening sitting, in answer to Mr. B. Cochrane, Lord J. RUSSELL said that the French Ambassador had not, as he supposed, been a private letter of the Emperor, containing expressions communicated to him a desire to see this country; but he was not aware of the most friendly feeling in laying it on the table.

LETTER TO THE EMPEROR OF CHINA.—On the motion for receiving the report of this bill, Mr. Hadfield moved its rejection, Colonel FRENCH intimated, on the part of the opponents of the measure, that they would not take any discussion on all of the opponents of the measure—Mr. HADFIELD asked whether, after the letter of the Emperor of the French, the Government would not withdraw the Bill.—Lord J. RUSSELL said that the Emperor Pekin was then received, and it was ordered to be read a third time on Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

VOLUNTEER FIELD ARTILLERY (IRELAND).—Mr. BERESFORD having withdrawn a motion of his relative to the Volunteer Field Artillery (Ireland) Bill, Lord PALMERSTON said it was his intention to extend to Ireland all powers to make rules and regulations for the discipline and organisation of volunteer corps, which now may be by law for the Government of Great Britain, urging that the distinction in this respect which existed between Ireland and the rest of the empire was unreasonable and that it existed no longer.—Mr. CARDWELL objected to a bill to assimilate the law in the two countries, as it might be an intention of the Government to use any powers which it was not intended to do; not from any distrust of the loyalty and good intentions of the Irish volunteers. Sir J. PAKINGTON said that the latest danger which would arise from placing arms in the hands of Irishmen.—Mr. MACGUIRE said there could not be an Irish member in the House who could be satisfied with the statement of Archbishop of Dublin, which had been read by Mr. Cardwell, as the danger against which England was to be defended, was not Ireland equally open to that danger? The policy of the Government was a policy which they did not care about Ireland; and she was left defenceless. After the declaration of Lord Palmerston and Mr. Cardwell, he (Mr. Maguire) felt that the French were to lead in Ireland. He could not trust them as foes—Lord PALMERSTON said that the Irish members would be sorry that he not held out much encouragement to the Government to alter the policy they had stated. The Government considered that there existed between an antagonism between classes in Ireland which would render it dangerous to place arms in the hands of the population; and much as he should not be able to meet the French as foes. He denied that Ireland was in a defenceless state, for there was an Irish regular force of nearly 30,000 men, and the Irish militia. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart and Colonel Dunne having spoken, Mr. HADFIELD urged that Ireland should be left to defend herself. Under respect for the Government which the rest of the empire.—Lord ASHLEY also spoke in favour of the proposal, and, amid cries for a division, he assured the House that he should divide, and stated that the system tended to reconcile sectarian differences. He hoped, however, he would not be driven to a division, as he should not do so if the motion was rejected by 86 to 30.

RIVERS AND THE NILE.—Mr. W. EWART, in reference to the business of the House, moved a series of resolutions.—Sir G. C. LEWIS thought it would be advisable if the House refrained from time to time to receive the report of the during the business of the House, and that such a Committee might be usefully appointed every session.—After some discussion the motion was withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

THE ATTORNEYS, SOLICITORS, PROCTORS, AND CERTIFICATED CONVEYANCERS BILL.—The House went into Committee on this bill, and progress was reported, the various clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

VOTES FOR DISQUALIFIED CANDIDATES BILL.—On the motion for going into Committee on this bill, Mr. ATTY. GEN. moved that it be postponed in deference to the opinion of several members and the feeling of the House, with a view it, and the bill was lost.

THE METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—On the motion for going into Committee on this bill, Mr. BRADY moved, as an amendment, that the House go into Committee that day three months; and after a discussion, in which Mr. Ayrton opposed and Mr. Locke and Mr. W. Ewart supported the motion, the House divided, when the numbers were—For the clause, 36; against it, 110—51.—Mr. HUBBARD moved as clause to the effect that no amount should be raised by the Board of Works in any parish except for the amount of expenses actually incurred in that parish.—On a division the clause was rejected by 114 to 54.—The other amendments and proposed clauses were postponed until the report.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:—viz., Mines Regulation and Inspection, Mines (Drainage), Police Superannuation (Dockyards), Heritable Securities, &c. (Scotland), Turnpike Acts Continuance, Bankruptcy (Ireland), Bank of Ireland (Stock), Inclosed Measures (Ireland), Sheriffs' Courthouses (Scotland), Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment, Municipal Boundaries (Ireland), Dundalk Bay, Tramways, Smithfield Market, Stream of Improvement, Drainage (Ireland), Duke and Town Improvement (Scotland) Act Amendment, and County Coroners Bills.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

NOTICES AND DEFENSIVE WORKS.

The House resolved itself into Committee, when the adjourned debate on Lord Palmerston's resolution for a grant of £2,000,000 for fortifications and Lord Palmerston's resolution by a policy of expending money on fortifications.

Mr. LINDSAY, who condemned the policy of expending money on fortifications. Mr. LINDSAY, who condemned the policy of expending money on fortifications. Mr. LINDSAY, who condemned the policy of expending money on fortifications.

LAST SCENE OF "THE ENCHANTED ISLE" AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

THE BENEFIT FOR THE LATE MR. R. B. BROUGH'S FAMILY.

We this week present an Illustration commemorative of the performance given on Wednesday week at Drury Lane for the benefit of the widow and children of the late Mr. Robert B. Brough. We have already congratulated the promoters of that laudable undertaking on the apparent success which attended their efforts on that occasion, as testified by the numerous audience and other demonstrations of the evening. Among the latter not the least was the manner in which the principal artists of the different theatres came forward to assist in the performance. The Haymarket, the Adelphi, the Princess', and the Strand Theatres poured in their contingents, and the members of the Savage Club gave their valuable aid to the cause. The scene which we have selected for illustration presents many of the members of these as constituting the close of the burlesque. Among them are Mr. Francis as Baccalappo, Mr. Hollingshed as Sonnitfaccio, Mr. Talfourd as Caliban, Mr. Buckingham as Prospero, Mr. Cruikshank as Alonzo, Mr. Angell as Gonsalvo, Mrs. Mellon as Ferdinand, and Miss Stirling as Miranda. The fairies were draughted from the Princess' rifle corps, and the lords, sailors, &c., were composed of the gentlemen of the Savage Club. We believe that their impersonations will be readily recognised, and we hope that their efforts and their effigies will tend still more to augment the account opened at Messrs. Coutts and Co.'s in favour of the deceased author's family.

MASSACRE OF A MISSION PARTY OF THE "ALAN GARDINER" BY THE NATIVES AT WOOLYA, TIERRA DEL FUEGO,—SEE SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 113.

SWEETSAUCE, THE WINNER OF THE STEWARDS' AND THE GOODWOOD CUPS.

SWEETSAUCE, THE WINNER OF THE GOODWOOD CUP.

THIS chestnut, which so unexpectedly burst on to the Turf world as the winner of the Goodwood Cup when they did not believe him capable, in racing parlance, of "getting above a mile," is the property of Lord Annesley, and trained by Mr. John Scott at Whitewall, near Malton. He made his maiden appearance in the Gimcrack Stakes at York, as third to Thormanby, and ran Vanquisher to a head for second money. At Doncaster he was twice over second—once to King of Diamonds for the Champagne Stakes, and again to High Treason for the Two-year-old Stakes, thus just missing the principal Two-year-old Stakes of the meeting. He then received forfeit in a match with Narcissus at Newmarket, and had the honour of being reckoned one of "Scott's lot" of fourteen for the winter, without, however, attracting any backers. At Northampton he came out for the Whittlebury Stakes, but was beaten a head after a slashing race with Fravola, who gave him 4lb. At the Newmarket Craven he won his maiden race—a sweepstakes of £450, over the Rowley Mile, against Palefac, Richmond, and three others; but the prestige of his stable companion, the Wizard, was so great after the Two Thousand that he received no Derby support, and was scratched. At Goodwood, on Tuesday week, he asserted the honour of England very decisively, with 20 to 1 against him, in the Stewards' Cup, when thirty-seven horses—one of the very "largest fields" on record—went to the post. America was second, with Maggiore; and France third, with Zouave.

In the Goodwood Cup, on the following Thursday, he had two French opponents in the three-year-old Gustave, to whom he gave 14lb., and the five-year-old Zouave, who gave him a stone; and it is rather remarkable that they should have run second and third. Starke, the American horse, was fourth; and Optimist, Horror (the winner of the Ascot Vase), Butterfly (the winner of the Oaks), and Highwayman were not placed. The betting was 8 to 1 against him at starting, and he positively seemed, as the spectators observed, "to win in a walk." After this race he was made first favourite at 7 to 2 for the Chesterfield Cup next day, and it was just on the cards that he might have performed the unparalleled feat of sweeping all the three cups of the meeting; but, independently of the steadying weight, 7st. 9lb. on a three-year-old, he was left some lengths in the rear at starting, and could only run into the sixth or seventh place among the twenty-six. As little as 8 to 1 has been taken about him for the St. Leger, in which Stampede, Umpire, Horror, Wallace, Sir William, Northern Light, The Wizard, Battlebone, Avalanche, Thormanby, Buccaneer, St. Albans, and Sabreur are also engaged. He is also in the Triennial Stakes at Newmarket, First October, the Scarborough Stakes at Doncaster, the Eglinton Stakes at York, and the Great Northern St. Leger at Stockton. He is by Sweetmeat from Irish Queen, and has rather a peculiar formation about his loins, which is gradually disappearing as he gets age upon him. Aldcroft has ridden him in four of his races, and Charlton and J. Snowden in the other three. His winnings, inclusive of the two cups, amount to about £2000.

THE GOODWOOD CUPS.

THE Stewards' Cup, by Messrs. London and Ryder, is of charming design and workmanship. The general form of the vase resembles the proportions of some antique models and the sculptural decorations are appropriately chosen from classic mythological fable. The group on the cover represents Bellerophon, mounted on Pegasus, the winged horse of the Muses, conquering the Chimæra. The action of the hero is animated, and the three diverse heads of the monster are set on the neck with great skill and apparent probability. Four delicately-executed medallions in low relief round the sides of the cup illustrate other poetical incidents relating to Pegasus. The shaft is decorated with the head of Medusa, winged monsters, and boys. The more strictly artistic portion of the design is of a superior character, while it would be difficult to praise too highly the elaborate invention and delicate execution of the silversmith's work. Mr. T. W. Reeve was the designer and modeller of this cup.

STEWARDS CUP. GOODWOOD CUP. CHESTERFIELD CUP.

THE GOODWOOD RACE PLATE.

The Goodwood Cup, by R. and S. Garrard and Co., is a finely-chased model of a thoroughbred horse, eighteen inches in height to the withers, independent of the ground and pedestal on which it is mounted. This work is the last executed by the late Edmund Cotterill, who for many years stood unrivalled as a modeller of the horse, and in it he has combined all the qualities necessary to ensure strength and speed in a racehorse. In addition to the usual anatomical knowledge of the horse acquired by most artists, a thorough practical knowledge was requisite to ensure the success with which the subject has been treated.

The Chesterfield Cup, by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, is in silver, of a composite style of ornament, and illustrates in an efficient and pleasing manner the Canterbury Pilgrimage. It may therefore be called the Chaucer Cup, as every part of the ornament of it illustrates the works of that celebrated author. On the cover the author is seated, surrounded by winged gemii of Poetry; the basal reliefs on the sides depict the procession from the Tabarde in Southwark, and the arrival of the Pilgrims at Canterbury, whilst the Hoste is surrounded by the listeners to his narrative. The stem of the cup bears the portraits of those Sovereigns who were contemporary with the poet; and at the foot are seated four of the chief interlocutors in the tales—the Knight, the Squire, the Yeoman, and the Monk. The handles of the vase are formed by figures of Spring, the poem opening at that time. The immense quantity of work upon the cup is its chief characteristic, the groupings are meritorious, the figures graceful, and the costume correct; the whole work reflecting great credit upon the artist, Mr. Thomas Brown, whose works we have before mentioned in connection with that of the eminent firm of Messrs. Hunt and Roskell.

CIGARS IN FRANCE.—An imperial decree of the 14th ult. fixes the selling price of cigars, whether made in Havannese Manufactures or France. The prices vary from 1c. to 20c. each. The same decree authorises the administration to sell to consumers, in whole boxes or packets, every description of tobacco or snuff made in the Imperial manufactories. The small Havannah cigars called "dames" will continue to be sold at the old price of 10c. till the stock in hand is exhausted.

THE FARM.

GREAT shows have come on during the last few days in an almost bewildering array. At Horncastle, Mr. Dudding of Panton's shorthorns were in high force as prize-takers. Mr. Eastwood's cow Rosette held her own in the cow class at the Royal Irish Society's Show, and got the Purefoil Challenge Cup; and Statesman (late the property of Mr. Wetherall and the winner at "The Yorkshire" last year) was a head prize-taker, along with Clydesdale and Soubadar. The two latter held the places they won in Dublin Spring; but Sir Colin, who was second to Dr. M'Hale on that occasion, had quite trained off. Lord Waterford was in good luck with Fury Fox before; and Captain Bell's second herd learnt "the winning trick" pretty early, as he not only took the head prize for yearling heifers with his Richmond, but gained the Purefoil Challenge Cup also by the bargain for the three best breeding horned beasts in the yard. Mr. Longfield beat Mr. Thunder (who showed a Canterbury prize sheep off his own pen) at the Leicester; and Mr. Beale Browne and Mr. O. W. Hamilton ruled the roast respectively at Cotswolds and Shropshire. Mr. Buckley Sidgwick in his "Ye Canterbury Pilgrims of 1860," a case of "orthodox rose with nose wins," as the two placed second, and her sister Ashland, the white was put before the roan. The Athelstanford herd also got the first prize in the cow class with Jael; and Mr. Backwood's Queen of Athelstane, Jael of Cashmere, and Inglet were first, second, and third among the yearling heifers. Messrs. Lambert, Ainslie, and Atkinson also had head prizes in the Border Counties.

The Yorkshire Society has had a splendid anniversary at Pontefract, and the exhibition of the leading show—which "Punch" terms thirty masters of hounds and half as many huntsmen together—last it a set it never had before. Royal Butterfly held his own as of yore against Prince Talleyrand and Rustler, and Stanley Lass in the ruck. The Booth blood had it all their own way in the yearling heifer class; but Sinbad the Sailor, who was third there, for Mr. Backwood's Harmless, by Harbinger, which won the heifer calf prize last year. The heifer calf prize was a high Shorthorn one, and it had to be the weak place in the judging, as Mr. Lascelles' Greolits, of Duchess' blood, the winner, although a wondrous handler, was completely beaten at her points in the second, Captain Bell's Rosebud by Sir Colin, will do loyally. The Harewood silver cup for the best shorthorn cow in any class produced a tremendous contest, and it was not till after the three judges had each picked a beast. Another judge was therefore called in, but declined to adjudicate, and another who was applied to gave it to Queen Bee, Mr. Emms's cow in Class 2, and by Lord Feversham's Duke and Duchess of Gloster. The Leicesters were a very excellent lot, Mr. Buston's cow Lady Lucy but ran against Mr. Wilby's Wily Mother. The latter veteran was also first and second with his pen of five Leicester shearing gimmers, and first with the best sow of the small breed. He has also suffered physic for the three days since prize by the hands of his neighbour, Sir George Wombwell, but with pigs of the Bramham blood. The local prize cattle were shown by Messrs. Hall and Messrs. Parry, Wickstead, and Percy Williams were the judges. There were nine entries in the well-bred hound class, and Rattler, first, Lord Middleton second, and Sir Watkin Wynn third, were the decision. For puppies there were only seven entries, and here the award was Mr. C. Isaac's, Sir Watkin Wynn second, and Lord Scarbrough's, third. Tom Sebright did not show, and Will Butler was the only huntsman to come in search. The hunters were numerous and excellent on the ground, and formed, with their toasts and speeches, a most unique, stirring group. Of the horse decisions we will speak in our next.

The North Lonsdale Agricultural Meeting will be held on Tuesday next in Ulverston Park, Ulverston, in which the Furness Railway yields to none of its rivals. No less than nine small silver challenge cups are given, five of them of the value of twenty guineas each, for horses not over fifteen and open to general competition, and a large one of 100 guineas value for shorthorns alone. The Cleveland Society holds its meeting on Thursday and Friday in Stockton-on-Tees, where a ram-lettings are still in strong force. On Tuesday Mr. Borton of Barton-le-Street, near Malton, begins to sell his Shorthorns, and on Wednesday Mr. R. Aylsford, of Westacre, near Swaffham, lets 100 of his long wools. The Cotswold rams will be very numerous on Wednesday in the Bristol market; and it will also be a great day for the Shropshire lettings. On Monday the rams of the Norton Calves Rock, which has long passed into private hands as "a thirty years' fold," will be let at Pendford, near Wolverhampton. The Freford rams will be let on Tuesday, and of them it can be said that only four went to Warwick and returned with a first prize and three with high commendations. On Thursday the rams of the Keeling flock, which is derived from the Sandy-and Norton Combe flocks, will be let at Yew-tree Farm, near Cannock. We hear that Mr. Holland, M.P., has had the misfortune of shoot 400 out of the 1,200 he first prize Shropshire ram which he purchased from Mr. Byrd at Canterbury.

AQUATICS.—Royal Yacht Squadron Annual Regatta: The annual regatta of this celebrated club commenced on Tuesday at Cowes, with the contest for the Prince Consort's Cup, by cutters belonging to the Royal Yacht Squadron. The Arrow was the victor, beating the Julaneth by eleven minutes. The others had no chance.

Thursday.—The first of the two last aquatic contest was rowed on Wednesday, and there has not been for years a finer race. The competitors came in in the following order:—Harry John Mennell, Phelps; Pollard; Benjamin Clyett, Trower; Nathaniel Bolles, jun., Old Barge-house; Jeffery Herbert Horsfall, Trower; Edward Hall, Old Barge-house; Edward Hall, Old Barge-house; Horsfall.

CRICKET.—The County of Kent v. the County of Sussex: The resumption of this match took place at the Tunbridge Wells ground on Monday, when the score is the score:—Kent, 212. Sussex, 1st innings, 77; 2nd innings, 86.

Nottingham v. Surrey: This match was begun on and is close last Saturday, at the Trent-bridge ground, Nottingham. The following is the score:—Surrey, 1st innings, 78; 2nd innings, 247. Nottingham, 1st innings, 136; 2nd innings, 136.

Gentlemen of Surrey v. Gentlemen of England: This match was played at the Surrey Ground, Kensington Oval, on Monday and Tuesday.—The match is drawn. The following is the score:—Gentlemen of England, 1st innings, 204. North, 171. Surrey, 1st innings, 51; 2nd innings, 106.

Marylebone and Gravesend v. United Services of Hampshire, with two Players: In this match, which was played at Lord's Ground on Monday and Tuesday, the M.C.C. were victorious in the following manner:—Marylebone M.C.C. and Ground, 1st innings, 134; 2nd innings, 148. Hampshire, 1st innings, 102; 2nd innings, 109.

THE GRAVES v. SEBASTOPOL.—The Nord publishes a letter from a Frenchman residing at Sebastopol, giving an account of the war, and a statement that any human bones has been removed from that place. He says he had just left Sebastopol, and had visited the battle-fields in company with an English tourist, and they found not the slightest trace of their having been in any way disturbed. The bones of the slain carried away were those of a very small number of animals, belonging to the besieging armies, which had died in the neighborhood; these were collected by a Jew, and exported for manure.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE publication of a remarkable and somewhat pacific letter written by the Emperor Napoleon to the Count de Persigny has had considerable influence upon the Stock Exchange. The tendency of the transactions throughout the week has been in the latter here referred to being considered genuine, large purchases of Consols, Rente, and Shares have been made, and many of the jobbers have thus been relieved of considerable amounts of stock. Scarcely anything has been done in foreign securities, the advanced demand for Spanish Certificates having been the only exception to the general dullness of the week. The Turkish Debt has likewise steadily improved in value.

There has been no change in the position of the International purposes; but, as the supply is large, very little change has taken place in the rates of discount. In the open market, 3 per cent. is the general value for bills, 2½ to 4 ; three months', 3 to 4 ; four months', 4 to 4½ ; and six months', 4½ to 5 per cent.

Large supplies of bullion—about £700,000—have come to hand from various quarters this week, and the Bank of England has received a considerable addition to its treasure account. There have, therefore, been no additions made to the stock in the Issue Department.

The subscription list for the £1,500,000 of East Indian Railway Five per Cent Debentures was filled up at a premium. The applications for shares to the extent of £250,000 have yet to be offered to the public. The whole amount will be required by 1st of September next.

Several additional failures in the leather trade have been announced; but, on the most part, the commercial transactions of the week in the manufacturing districts have been checked here by the suicide of the manager of one of the Liverpool banks, the particulars of which are given in our Liverpool letter.

The last instalment of 20 per cent on the Brazilian loan of £1,372,012 has been paid into the Bank.

The dividend of the Electric Telegraph Company is at the rate of 7 per cent per annum; and the interim dividend upon the shares of the Union Bank of London and County Bank, 5 per cent for the past half-year.

The unsatisfactory news from Mexico, the capture of Matamoros, of Mexico, who failed some time since for £900,000, have obtained a period of five years to pay off their indebtedness at 3 per cent interest, payable half-yearly, and the foreign firms have stopped payment.

A new description of security—"The India Department," has been opened at the Bank of England, in which all business connected with India, and formerly transacted at the East India House, will be conducted.

On Monday the dealings in Home Stocks were somewhat restricted; nevertheless, prices were firmly supported. Bank Stock, 219 to 220; Reduced 3 per Cent, 91 to 91½; Ditto Five per Cent Paper, 97 96½. Reduced Three per Cents realised 90¾ ⅛; New Three per Cents, 90¾ ⅛; Long Annuities, 1885, 3 3-16; Ditto, 1903, 3 3-16; Ditto, 1885, 3 3-16; Long Annuities, 1860, 3⅛; Ditto 1885, 3⅛; India Five per Cents, 101½ to 102; Ditto Five per Cent Bonds, 1860, 101½; Exchequer Bills, 1860, 1 Tuesday, and the market was in a healthy state:—Bank Stock marked 218½ to 219½; Reduced 3 per Cent, 91 to 91½; New Three per Cents, 90¾ ⅛; Ditto for Account, 90¾ ⅛; New Two per Cents, 90¾ ⅛; India Five per Cents, 101½ to 102; Ditto Five per Cent Bonds, 1860, 101½; Ditto Five per Cent Paper, 97 to 98; Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 5s. prem. India Five per Cent Paper realised 97½ to 98. Brazilian Five-and-half per Cent Bonds, 104 to 104½. Little activity was apparent on Wednesday, and the market closed at the annexed quotations:—Bank Stock, 218½; Reduced Three per Cents, 90¾ ⅛; Consols, for Money, 90¾ ⅛; Ditto, for Time, 90¾ ⅛; New Three per Cents, 90¾ ⅛; Long Annuities, 1885, 3 3-16; Ditto, 1903, 3 3-16; India Five per Cents, 101½ to 102; Ditto Five per Cent Paper, 97; Ditto Five-and-half per Cent, 104½; Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 5s. prem. Business was done in Consols on Thursday at the annexed prices:—Bank Stock, 218½; Reduced Three per Cents, 90¾ ⅛; New Three per Cents, 90¾ ⅛; the Reduced, 94¾; Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 5s. prem.; India Five per Cent Paper, 97½; Ditto Five-and-half per Cent, 104½; Brazilian Five per Cent Paper, 97½; Ditto, Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104½. ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL FUND.
The task which the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's have undertaken have entered upon, and in which they ask for the cordial co-operation of the public, is the restoration of the choir, which is especially required to be carefully repaired, and, as far as possible, to rid, in the completion of the interior of their magnificent Cathedral, so long left cold and unfinished, which would then bear comparison with any building in the world, and be an object of just pride instead of regret to Londoners.
The Dean and Chapter have, ever since the inauguration of the Cathedral for Divine worship throughout its entire area. For this an effectual system of warming the church has been one of the first requisites.
The organ of the choir has been removed from the stalls and placed on the north side, opposite the pulpit, and, in consequence of this, the screen has been removed, so that the choir and sanctuary are open to the nave, and the new arrangements of the choir-stalls, which has become necessary from the removal of the organ screen, will be in accordance with the general design and symmetry of the building, but will also greatly increase the accommodation for the congregation in the choir and sanctuary.
The Dean and Chapter, in the Prayer Book, 1871, and in the Preparation, has been purchased, and it is proposed to erect it in the north-east corner of the Cathedral, in the place of the present Jodrell Chapel.
On the abovementioned works an outlay of about £7000 has been incurred. Of this sum £2000 has been contributed; and £5000 more, or £6000 will be required, towards which the Committee have received £1000 from the Queen.
The £5000 remaining unpaid may be considered as a debt on the Cathedral, which, under very moderate care, when the great expenses of the past few years have been liquidated, is made by the wealthiest community in the world.
There are very many other subscribers available, these having passed out of the control of the Dean and Chapter, who, with the Committee, have undertaken the work, and who have contributed the £3000 already received, and who will be expected to receive the Special Evening Services. The money, therefore, that is wanting is not for the completion of the Cathedral, but a part of the important undertaking.
The Corporation of Dublin has recently subscribed the princely sum of £1000 to the restoration of St. Patrick's Cathedral, and the present appeal has been before the London public for more than two years!

THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

NARROW ESCAPE OF OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

A MARCH THROUGH SICILY WITH THE CENTRE COLUMN OF THE NATIONAL ARMY.

CATANIA, July 16.

AT Caltanisetta I intrusted a letter containing particulars of our march as far as that town to a person who was recommended to me as going to Messina, and who, I was told, would post it for me on board the Messageries Impériale steamer, leaving that port direct for Marseilles. To my astonishment I met the same individual in Catania the evening of our arrival, and found, to my disgust, he still carried the said letter in his breast pocket, and what with grease and friction against other papers the writing had become illegible, so that I am compelled to crowd my impressions into one despatch. I am afraid the sketches forwarded by another route will have lost much of their interest from being published without the descriptive matter which should have reached you almost simultaneously with them. With this preface I will transport myself back to Palermo, and begin the history of our march with the departure of the column from that city.

Having obtained permission from the General to accompany the first column of volunteers dispatched into the interior of Sicily (after the fall of Palermo), I waited on Colonel Türr, who was to have the command, for orders. On June 20, at 6 p.m., I repaired to the place of rendezvous on the Piazza Reale, and there found the troops assembled for inspection, numbering in all some one thousand men, with two pieces of cannon. Three hundred of the volunteers were Palermitans, some of whom bore the proudest titles in Sicily, and who were content to abandon their luxurious homes and superfine suits for the mountain hat-cover, and red shirts and grey cotton trousers of the revolutionary soldiers. I have already made some remarks on the conduct of the Sicilians during the three days' fighting in Palermo which prevailed in the city here to-day. Suffice it to say that the Prince of Villafranca, at the head of the Municipality, and the Marquis de la Motte, Comte de Santo Martino, Baron de Sto. Giuliano, Baron Cosso, Chevalier Mercadante, Chevalier de Maria, and others, have done everything in their power to induce the people to remain quiet, and to forget all private feuds, and all revenge for the past, and they have succeeded. But the Neapolitans had hitherto had it their own way in the streets, and the thoroughfares had become positively dangerous to peaceable citizens. Even though many streets were still blocked up with the debris of fallen houses, a number of carriages freighted with their precious freight of lustrous-eyed, olive-complexioned beauties surrounded the Piazza, the occupants in many instances tearfully watching the preparations making for the departure of the troops, and the near approach of the hour to the departure of the steamer.

The first village we came to was Villa Abbate, and as it was now dark the people at our approach improvised a temporary illumination by means of grass and straw in front of their cottages, which they set fire to as we passed through. The effect produced by these bonfires was very fine indeed, as in almost every instance we found a picturesque group assembled round the fire, the bright red flame.

Our first march necessarily was not a very long one, as the greater portion of the brigade were volunteers, and required to be gradually broken into long distances; so Misilmeri, which is nine miles from Palermo, was chosen as our first halting-place. We accordingly reached at half-past eleven p.m. Nine miles in the dark, along a dusty, and in some parts broken, road is a very long beginning for a company of troops many of whom had previously only been used to a quiet lounge without knapsack or rifle, and to whom the sight of a musket was a monster on the Marina, with nothing heavier than a silver-mounted cane to carry instead of, as in these days, a knapsack and rifle of great-coat and haversack over the shoulder. I must confess I was not at all sorry to see the lights of Misilmeri twinkling in the distance, for, like many of the others, I wanted two or three days' practice to get me into working condition. However, I managed to keep up with the front with the Captain of the advanced guard, though the rolled mantle across my chest and tightly-belted sword were innovations to my comfort, and I was little astonished to find that one of these General Tür, who was slightly behind, spurred on his horse and laughingly complimented me on my soldierlike bearing. Now, I am not a little proud of the brevet rank of "Captain Acting Quartermaster," and how the whole of the brigade knew me as "Il Capitano Inglese." There were sundry rumours afloat to break the monotony of the march, such as the picking up of some velveteen-clad gentry armed with long guns, who could not give a satisfactory account of themselves, and the cocasse appearance of a musket by accident in the ranks, which caused some excitement in the column, as it had been reported that three or four shiploads of the troops that had crossed from Calabria had landed some thirty miles lower down the coast, and there was a kind of half notion that we should fall in with them on the march, and arms were passed us to prick up our ears.

However, as I have said, we reached Misilmeri at half-past eleven, without any very remarkable adventure en route, and in a few minutes the three wineshops in the place were invaded by thirsty groups clamorously asking for bicchieri di rosso. I was accordingly engaged in contemplating the bottom of a glass placed at an elevated angle above the nose I was tapped on the shoulder by Captain Ashton, the brigade acting-Commissary, who told me that he had secured me a lodging at the "Locanda" with three officers. "Taking nine ease at mine inn" is a very different thing at Misilmeri to what it would be in any of the snug English hostelry. On reaching the quarters chosen for me I found my companions already stretched at length on the floor of the guardroom, to get furniture in the room. One of them I should have said was engaged with the oil-wick making a minute search of his coach, and from his methodical countenance I augured badly for my night's rest; but, lighting a Cavour cigar, I resigned myself, after a few brief words of courtesy with my friends, to the fate which my stars would have shamed the choicest inventions of Manicalco. The next morning, on going to head-quarters, I found the General had been attacked with fever, and that we must not expect to move much on the following day, as it was necessary to send to Palermo for a carriage for him. It was I mentioned before that the Neapolitans avoided as the arm during the campaign of 1859. From this wound he still suffers, and, what with the fatigue he had undergone during the landing in Sicily and this wound coming on, he was more completely prostrated. On the afternoon of the 22nd we proceeded on our march, and, as the General had but a carriage, his Aide-de-camp and I had to say that I could have his horse, an offer not to be refused. The day spent in Misilmeri was not lost, as we obtained sixty-three volunteers from the native militia.

As the column debouched from the village it entered immediately a rich and fertile valley, bordered on the left by a range of hills that shut out the sea from the land, and on the right by lofty mountains cultivated to the very summit. Sicily is indeed a beautiful land, and well does it deserve the name of the "granary of Italy." Everything thrives on its beautiful face, and nothing is wanting but a good government, and the commencement of its people to enjoy the rich bounties showered upon its God's earth. On emerging from this Edenlike valley the scene changed completely. Rugged mountains, rent and torn asunder by volcanic agency at some far remote period stood like giant sentinels on each side of the pass, catching on the last rays of the setting sun, and casting the purple shadows of eccentric form over the burnt heath, which had taken the place of orange and lemon groves, vineyards, and vineyards.

Near midnight we bivouacked on the slope of a mountain fringed with a golden harvest of wheat, for corn is plentiful in this rich and unclean barren. Dismounting from my horse, I made for the Switzer company's fire, having arranged with their Captain to mess with himself and Lieutenant——but a hail arrangement for me, as they were both old soldiers, and men of great experience in making a great deal out of a little. The Captain had served with the French Foreign Legion in Africa from 1840 to 1849, when he joined Garibaldi at Rome, since which period he has served with the illustrious chieftain when occasion offered. He had a wonderful knowledge of men and things, and is scarcely a plant that grows by the wayside that does not serve his purpose. My friend the Captain has been English tutor to some princely Russian youngster much to bring us together. From 1850 to 1859 a great portion of his time was spent in England, and there is somewhere in the north-west district of London a fair-haired, blue-eyed damsel whose souvenir he carries with him beneath his tunic in the shape of a worked pair of braces. When this war of liberation shall be finished there will be great rejoicing at least in one house in the said north-west district, for the said fair-haired Captain shall then return to claim and procure him a license of matrimony at Doctors' Commons, and betake him to the cultivation of the arts of peace and a small garden in the suburbs of the great metropolis. I like my friend the Captain in anything but his usual good temper. He is Quartermaster for the choice he had made of the ground for bivouacking; there was not a drop of water to be procured nearer than three miles. Now, water is the first essential to troops after a long and dusty march in a hot climate; and there were many sufferers, more from thirst than fatigue, amongst the prostrate groups of panting men. Giving my horse to my servant Hermanigue, one of the heroes subject, who tethered him to his bayonet stuck in the ground, I joined the Captain in abusing the Quartermaster; for I, too, was thirsty; but, finding that talked but little good effect, I wrapped myself round the desire for water, I cut down with my sword some prickly nettles which encumbered the ground, and, with my head pillowed beneath my head, was soon fast asleep, with my feet to the fire.

At three a.m. the trumpets sounded "La Sveglia," and by half-past we had resumed our march to Villafrati. When I was roused I felt cold, miserable, and anything but enthusiastic in the cause of Garibaldi; but, after a hasty breakfast of coffee, bread, and cold meat out for want of fuel, and a cold, chill wind came rustling down from the highlands; but when my eyes had become used to the shadowed the darkness around soon restored me to good humour. On our arrival at the camping-ground the previous night darkness prevented our distinguishing the beauties around us, but with the light of the glorious fires, and I was wholly unprepared for the scene of enchantment which burst upon me. About one, on both sides of the road, stood my picturesque groups of sleeping soldiers. Right and left rose towering hills, richly cultivated to near their summits, and studded with jungle bushes, and in the middle distance, on a rocky mound, were the ruins of an old Saracenic castle known as the "Castello del Diavolo," while behind a rocky and precipitous barrier sought the first beams of the rising sun, their rugged slopes illumined with a most beautiful and delicate rose tint. This scene altogether was a most beautiful and delicate one. The Five Etruscan, but the limited time given me between the revie' and the breaking up of the bivouac prevented me doing justice to the subject, which I intend to make the subject of a separate sketch. [This Illustration appeared in the Number for last week.]

At seven a.m. we entered Villafrati, my quarters there were even more exceeable than those at Misilmeri. Here the column was compelled to halt for the day, but not to be over the previous illness of General Türr, whose medical advisers thought it imperative he should remain to-day in bed, as the fever was threatening him. As soon as a new Brigadier should join he should proceed thither.

While walking through the village some three hours after our arrival I met cousin Tom, who was accompanied by four others all mounted and armed, a fine, handsome man, having on his head a wideawake with a long feather, a red shirt, and a rifle slung at his back. The rest of his costume was composed of a red shirt and black velvet breeches tucked into high half boots. For the present the duties of the commissariat department of the Revolutionary troops, though the fare was unfamiliar to me. Returning shortly afterwards, I again encountered him, but this time with a goodly number of men, all in the companions, by a file of soldiers. On inquiring from the officer in charge of the guard the meaning of the arrest, I found that the principle of the Lieutenant had been stopped by a party of banditti on the road between Villafrati and Palermo, and robbed of everything he possessed, and that from some circumstances which had come to light it appeared that one of the prisoners belonged to the gang, and that probably my friend with his escort had come upon the chief of the band. A council of war was at once called to try the supposed brigands, for our mission to a great extent was to hunt and exterminate on our march the numerous bands of robbers that, under the false defence of Santonelli, for such was the name of the man in question, was that, despite the severity of the punishment which would be meted out, he could actually prove a single act of brigandage of which he personally was guilty; that, far from being a robber chief, he was known as a man of peace and charity, who was universally liked, and that one of the first to raise the tricolour flag and proclaim the revolution in the hills and that he actually had been wounded in an engagement having enlisted under his banner, committed depredations in his name. However, the evidence brought to bear on the case proved that the prisoner was of a most compromising character, that the council of war determined the prisoners should be sent to Palermo for General Garibaldi to decide upon their fate. [See Illustration on page 102.]

It will be well here to say that I am ignorant of the existence of this "episode" ——— In the different mountain districts certain unprincipled men under cover of the tricolour flag got together a band of adventurers, and, at the head of all these men, they descended on the villages, and take the purses and cut the throats of the rich under pretence of the Revolution. Santonelli's misfortune was that he did not make the revolution unpopular amongst those to whom we should look for support, who argue that under the régime of Francesco II. and the Police Minister Maniscalco, a man to be at least sleep quietly in their beds, though occasionally an outrage might be committed in the mountain districts. Unfortunately for an Italian cause the Sicilian people is easy to be understood, and we must do our best to do away with the cause, and disabuse them of the belief that the Italian cause is but a less severe despotism than it was under the despotic Government of the Bourbons.

But speaking of Santonelli has nearly made me forget the presence in Villafrati of a personage whose reputation is European. It may not appear very flattering to mention the name of one who has figured in the police reports of the Continental Courts, and whose name has been in Villafrati I had the great honour to mess and be introduced to Maniscalco. I was told that he had been a most accomplished gentleman, was passing through Sicily in the track of our column. He is engaged in writing the history of the revolution, which will in reality be a most interesting work, as he has unrivalled facilities for the task, and from opposite sources crammed into it. No offence to our neighbours across the Channel, but Paris is the most corrupt capital for obtaining correct information. For instance, M. Dumas, on arriving at Palermo about a fortnight after the capture of the place by Garibaldi, was received with open arms by the Municipality, and almost as many sheets of copy an hour as a cylinder machine would print in the same time. He had not been in Palermo as yet seven days, and yet he wrote in response to a query from one, which was flatly contradicted the very next minute by information obtained from another, provided him with the most ample facilities for writing.

The other day an officer told me that Dumas, having heard he had been present at the battle of Calatafimi, had asked him for information. My friend commenced with a topographical description of the ground, and the enemy's position, but Dumas, with a wave of his hand, exclaimed, "Mais, mon cher, tout cela est bien grand et bien beau, mais vous n'avez pas mon faculté d'imagination. Vous ne voyez pas les choses comme moi, et vous ne pouvez pas faire un bon article." The answer to my query as to his reason for carrying arms, for slung over his shoulder was a long gun, and in each pocket of his velvet jacket a pair of pistols, was that in the present state of the country he would not ride a hundred yards from his house without the same precaution. The Count receives a visit from a mountain track into the hills. After a leisurely riding for about an hour we espied coming towards us a tolerably numerous cavalcade, which, on a nearer approach, proved to be nothing else than the Count's household, the beautiful order of which did great credit to the Scotch overseer, and to explorations among the hills, and at six o'clock we found ourselves at the foot of the hill, and shook with Fleming for an escort back to Vallelunga. There I met with a gentleman going to Santa Caterina, and as he was a friend of mine I had no objection to a carriage and make route ensemble for mutual protection. My new acquaintance carried the gun which every peasant going to work has been on Sunday, and, though in Sicily every man's hand was lifted against his neighbour, and to a certain extent the state of affairs in Naples, the country has a most beautiful and tranquil appearance. Nothing could be more beautiful, amidst an assemblage of rusty-looking priests, ragged peasantry, tawny-skinned urchins in a state of nature, pigs with their litters, fluttering broods of cackling capons, and other domestic fowl, than the Countess herself, who had preceded us, that there was absolutely nothing to be obtained in the village. The Countess, with the true spirit of a Sicilian lady, "Donna mangiari" was everywhere the same, a council of war was immediately called, composed of the Captain and Lieutenant of the Swiss company, an officer of my own myself. The result was that the wants of nature were paramount and must be administered to; that a writ of habeas corpus should be issued in the name of the Lord Angus found at large; and that, if necessary, arms should be used in the capture. It was further resolved that, as certain members of the municipal court had absented themselves, a certain Francis Vizetelly should be deputed to make the arrests, and that the artillery officer's revolver should be borrowed for the use of the latter functionary, as the authority in this matter should be made to be respected and subscribed to by all those whom it concerned. Accordingly, on the following morning, as a day of mourning on many dungheaps, and it will be commemorated in the pages of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS under the title of "Breakfast-Table Incidents," I proceeded to the municipal court, and, walking our march to Alia, a town perched on the crest of a steep and rocky hill. The locality was a good deal like Sicily at large, in a perfect contempt for uphill work, for, with but one or two exceptions, every village or town that we came to on our line of march, and most of them were built on mountains, presented the loftiest sites in the country.

Vallelunga, of which you have received a drawing, was the next halting-place. On the evening of the 23rd the column of Garibaldians began at Villafrati, with one of the most worthy and estimable men in Sicily, a true Sicilian nobleman——the Prince of Villafranca, whose name, with the "Females" of "Routledgian" fame were gallantly and hospitably treated by this same gentleman, and that all through the time of the Bourbon tyranny and intolerable misery. At the warmly-expressed invitation of Count Tasca I consented to leave the column for a couple of days, and to pay a visit to his house in the mountains managed for him by a Scotchman named Fleming, who it was arranged should come to Vallelunga and meet us. The picture of an English gentleman's house in the midst of the Sicilian hills is one to most of your readers. A beaver hat, velveteen shooting-coat, cord breeches and leather gaiters, a rifle, and a pair of pistols complete the man of the house; a Scotch farmer of the mountains domiciled in a somewhat different manner. The Villa Tasca is a large, square building, the door suddenly opened, and a tall, fine man, of a superior brigandish appearance, clothed in velveteen and leather, presented himself to our arrival, and to my utter astonishment exclaimed as he advanced towards me in not-to-be-mistaken north-country English, "How are you? I am proved to see you." Fleming, in answer to my query as to his reason for carrying arms, for slung over his shoulder was a long gun, and in each pocket of his velvet jacket a pair of pistols, told me that in the present state of the country he would not ride a hundred yards from his house without the same precaution. The Count receives a visit from a mountain track into the hills. After a leisurely riding for about an hour we espied coming towards us a tolerably numerous cavalcade, which, on a nearer approach, proved to be nothing else than the Count's household, the beautiful order of which did great credit to the Scotch overseer, and to explorations among the hills, and at six o'clock we found ourselves at the foot of the hill, and shook with Fleming for an escort back to Vallelunga. There I met with a gentleman going to Santa Caterina, and as he was a friend of mine I had no objection to a carriage and make route ensemble for mutual protection. My new acquaintance carried the gun which every peasant going to work has been on Sunday, and, though in Sicily every man's hand was lifted against his neighbour, and to a certain extent the state of affairs in Naples, the country has a most beautiful and tranquil appearance. Nothing could be more beautiful, amidst the most passions of the worst of the population. While passing through a most desolate district, about two miles from Vallelunga, a peasant, who was coming from behind a bush of prickly cactus, and, with an imperative gesture of the arm, cried out "Fermate!" Our carriage and saddle horses were pulled up in the carriage, shouted in the coachman's ear "Forwards!" and, getting a certain distance from the ambush, fired a pistol. The coachman has the horses, which were tolerably good, into a gallop, we turned a corner of the road before the brigand——for such he surely was——could fire upon us. As we flew along I gave one glance behind, ready to dodge should a shot come, and perceived half-a-dozen more hastening down from the neighbouring hill to support their comrade. [See Illustration on previous page.]

From Santa Caterina we marched to Caltanisetta, where we halted for a few days, the men having need of some repose, and the sick——of whom there were many——requiring regular hospital attendance.

MASSACRE OF A MISSIONARY PARTY IN TIERRA DEL FUEGO.

We have received from Mr. Thomas Havers, of Port Stanley, Falkland Islands, a detailed narrative of the circumstances attendant on the massacre of a mission party, on board the schooner Allen Gardiner, by the natives of Tierra del Fuego, and we extract from it a few passages for the better understanding of the accompanying Engravings. It will be in the recollection of those who have also published to Mr. Havers—the massacre, for the Sketch of which we are also indebted to Mr. Havers—

PORT STANLEY, FALKLAND ISLANDS, Tuesday, March 27, 1860.

In the third week of October, 1859, the schooner Allen Gardiner, belonging to the Patagonian Missionary Society, left the port of Stanley (a diminutive British settlement on East Falkland Island), bound to the Beagle Channel, in Tierra del Fuego. The Mission party was composed of Captain Fell, the master, his brother, Mr. Fell, the mate, Johnston, carpenter, Allen, Bryant, Pearce, Mr. M'Dowell (a native), Hawey, an old man-of-war's-man, three Swedish sailors, named Jahnon, Braun, and Petersen, and, lastly, the Christianised Fuegians, consisting of seven individuals. She Phillips, missionary catechist, and the object of her voyage was to return these people to their native country, and to leave Mr. Maodonald, a Christianised native Fuegian, and the object of her voyage was to return these people to their native country, and to leave Mr. Maodonald, also Billy Button (a brother of the notorious Jemmy Button mentioned in Captain Fitzroy's "Voyage of the Beagle"), Jack Button, and wife; Maokoodlan, alias Tom Button, another brother, and his wife Winnecenaguokmeyer, of age—all of the Christianised party, with the exception of sixteen years of age—all of the tribe of Jemmy Button, resident at Woolloya, on Navarin Island, Schweyncuggina, with his wife Gheddiwelyer, and little girl, three Schweyncuggina, with his wife Gheddiwelyer, and little girl, three years old, named Kiattagattamaweyker, who are of a tribe named Oens-wen, living chiefly on Lemon Island, and about Good called Oens-wen, living chiefly on Lemon Island, and about Good Success Bay, possessing bows and arrows, which the Woolloya men have not. In all there were nine natives.

It appears that the Allen Gardiner came to anchor in Woolloya Cove on the 10th of November, and on the 2nd landed seven of the natives, who were searched before going ashore, the ship's side, a precaution which was a former occasion given grave offence at Keppel, seeing that on a former occasion given grave offence at Keppel, where the injured party vowed vengeance, and threatened to "put 'em in the pot the first opportunity of season, and thrustened to "put 'em in the ground 'soone day." Maokoodlan submitted quietly to the search, but was taken ashore in the ship's boat that accompanied the schooner, and but Mackeewenchey and Schweyncuggins were highly indignant; the latter violently so, and threw away and destroyed their presents. Schweyncuggina in his rage seized Capt. Fell by the collar, but was knocked off by him. The two then bundled their wives into a canoe alongside, refusing to go in the ship's boat, and paddled ashore in high dudgeon, Lecessgus accompanying them; and not being left on board but Oocockcowenagh, who did not feel disposed to leave the schooner, and had expressed a wish to return in her. Next day the whole of the crew went ashore to cut wood, and a quarrel arose on the part of Jemmy Button, who considered his presents were not good enough, and charged Captain Fell with having kept some back. The storm with Jemmy appeared to blow over. The large boat formerly built by the mission party on the flat near the beach was repaired, and the shipment of wood was proceeded with. Sunday, November 6, the daily (a very unusual circumstance), and by Sunday, November 6, the assemblage of natives—men, women, and children—amounted to near 200. Several of the crew of the Allen Gardiner became more apprehensive at the threatening aspect and increasing numbers of the natives; but the leader of the party seems to have disregarded all the obvious signs that should naturally have suggested caution or reserve. On Monday morning, November 7, Johnston, and not go ashore until the Docockowenagh, when he accompanied the European party on board, ostensibly, when he accompanied the European party on board, with the sole exception of Jemmy Button, who, with his wife, went ashore to look after their property. Johnston, Allen, and Bryant went ashore to look after their property. Johnston, Allen, and Bryant went ashore to look after their property. Johnston, Allen, and Bryant high rate of pressure is likely to produce heated bearings and consequent accident. After getting into the Sound, however, the Giraffe gradually became more lively, and soon attained a high rate of speed. The ship was as steady as a rock, and it was only by noting the rapidity with which headland, hill, and bay flew behind, and the high wind created on a still day by the pressure forward, that the party on board had any notion of the great speed at which they were being urged onward. Some engineer and scientific gentlemen, however, took occasion to time the ship for an hour or two before arriving at her destination, and they concurred in stating that the Giraffe had made fully twenty miles an hour, and that even then she was not by any means at the top of her speed. Going and coming the trip was delightful. The day was still, warm, and beautiful, and the sea as placid as ever lay under a summer sun.

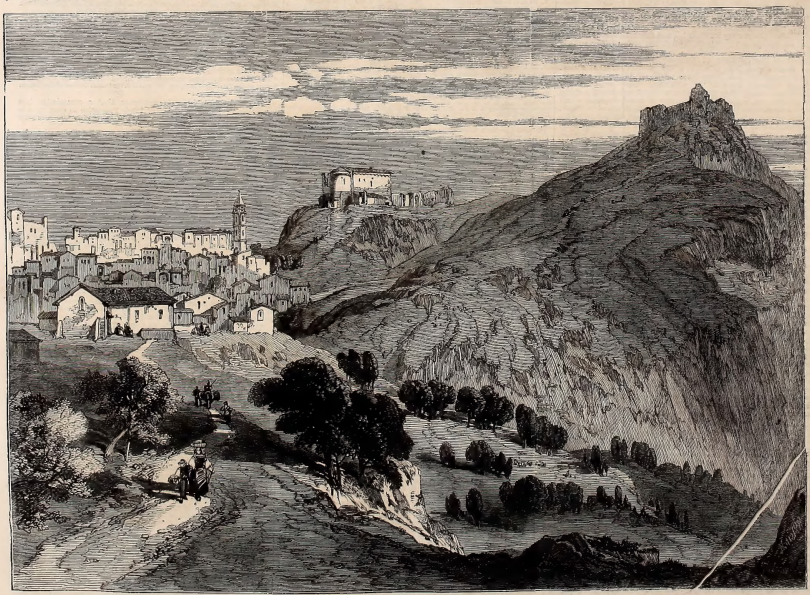
At the burgh the Lord Provost and his friends had a cordial welcome. All the bells were ringing, and the population turned out in great force to do the honours of the town. Re-embarking amid hearty cheers, and the inspiriting strains of Mr. Agnew's band of the Queen's Own, which accompanied the steamer, the Giraffe steamed into the Sound, and now the bell rang for dinner, when 125 gentlemen sat down with great comfort in the spacious fore saloon. A few toasts were duly honoured; but in such a glorious day the company did not seem disposed to tarry over their wine under deck, and they adjourned easily to the open air, where they found they were now skirting the Garrochhead of Bute, having run from Campbeltown at fully twenty miles an hour. In due course the voyagers who desired to remain at the coast were respectively left at Wemyss Bay on the south and Kirn on the north shores, and the Giraffe reached Greenock in time for the half-past eight train, and before ten the "balance" was safely deposited in Glasgow.

On the following Tuesday the Giraffe started from the Cloch Lighthouse at eight in the morning, and reached Belfast in five hours and forty minutes, under somewhat unfavourable circumstances, as she had to contend against a head wind, and one of her engines unfortunately heated. As it was, this speed between the Clyde and Belfast has never been approached. The Giraffe met a hearty welcome at Belfast from the harbour commissioners and other gentlemen. Two hours were spent in visiting places of interest in this enterprising Irish town. The Giraffe started on her return voyage about four o'clock in the afternoon, and arrived at Greenock, after a stoppage at Wemyss Bay and a détour to Dunoon, before eleven o'clock.

The length of the Giraffe over all is 280 ft., her breadth of beam is 26 ft., and her depth 13 ft. 6 in. She has two oscillating engines, 62-inch cylinders, 5 ft. 6 in. stroke; feathering paddle-wheels 29 ft. 6 in. diameter; and six tubular (cylindrical) boilers, which have been proved to 80lb. pressure, and may with every safety be worked to a pressure of 40lb. She has all the recent improvements in fittings and machinery. The ship and engines were built by the Messrs. Thomson, of Glasgow.

NEW STEAM-SHIP "GIRAFFE" FOR THE GLASGOW AND BELFAST ROYAL MAIL LINE.

THE ROYAL PALACE, STOCKHOLM.



THE ROYAL PALACE, STOCKHOLM.

STOCKHOLM has been justly called the Venice of the North. There is one view in it which strongly recalls that of the Doge's Palace and Piazza di San Marco. It is that of the north-east front of the palace with its quaken or square on the south-east, and the extensive and massive quay of granite beneath, with boats and vessels gliding about in the fjord. As a whole Stockholm cannot, of course, compete in picturesque effect with the Queen of the Adriatic, but its situation is very lovely.

The Palace is the great object of attraction. Built on the highest part of the central island, its vast and massive walls tower above all the neighbouring buildings. It contains the principal collections, and most of the other objects of interest are in its immediate neighbourhood.

"This noble structure was completed in 1753, from the designs of the Count Tessin, by his son. The basement story is of granite, the rest of brick and stucco. It consists of a quadrangle of huge dimensions, with wings at each corner, two stories lower than the centre. In front these wings inclose an extensive terrace, laid out as a garden, and overlooking the quay and harbour. At the back is an outer courtyard, with guardhouses for the military on duty at the Palace. The general style of the architecture is chaste, simple, and massive, and the proportions of the whole structure grand and admirable. The finest views of the Palace and most picturesque portions of the town are from the opposite side of the water on the south-east. The north-west entrance to the Palace from the foot of the new bridge is known as the Lion's Staircase. It forms two broad inclined planes, rising in opposite directions from the quay, and leading to a spacious platform in front of the gate. The whole structure is of solid granite, beautifully designed, and decorated with two colossal lions in bronze. The view from this platform over the bridge, the Malar Lake, and the northern suburb, is one of the finest in Stockholm.

"The Royal Museum is in the Palace, and comprises several collections. The entrance is on the left from the Lion's Staircase. The Picture Gallery contains about 500 pictures, of the Italian, Dutch, and Flemish schools. The collection of drawings by old masters of the various schools is extensive, and contains some fine things, particularly of the Italian school. The group of the sculptures Mercury in the Sleeping Argus. The collection comprises about two hundred, and sixty objects; and in addition to the above there are several busts and portions of statues of Apollo, and of Queens who were Vestals. The Egyptian and Etruscan collections comprise a large variety of objects, but not of a very high class; also some good Danish vases. The Royal library is contained in a splendid room running almost the whole length of the south-east wing of the Palace, and the entrance is opposite that to the picture gallery. It comprises about 70,000 volumes, although but of comparatively recent formation. The money and medallion cabinet contains about 30,000 specimens. It is particularly rich in Greek and Roman examples, Oriental and Anglo-Saxon: of the last most have been found in Sweden. The cabinet of Northern antiquities is chiefly composed of objects found in Sweden. It comprises ornaments of gold and silver, enriched with precious stones, urns, and other articles of pottery, and a variety of objects formed of stone, brass, bronze, and iron. The Chapel Royal in the Palace is decorated in a florid style, and the paintings are modern, and executed in oil; much interest as works of art. The private apartments are chiefly in the north-east side of the Palace.

"Upon the Skeppsholm (the esplanade on the south of the Palace) is a granite obelisk, 100 feet high, erected by Gustavus IV. to commemorate the valour and fidelity of the officers of Stockholm in the war with Russia in 1788-90. And lower down, near the water, is a fine bronze statue of Gustavus III., by Sergell, and considered his best work. It is admirably placed on the spot where Gustavus landed in triumph (1790) after the hard-fought battle of Svenskund, and is a great ornament to the noble quay, while it is seen to much advantage."

CALATAFIMI, SICILY

CARIBALDI, in his rapid rush from Marsala to Palermo, pounced, it will be recollected, upon Calatafimi, a town in the neighbourhood of Trapani. Its inhabitants have been variously estimated at from 6000 to 10,000—one authority, indeed, fixing the number as high as 20,000. The town, we are informed, in respect, was once walled, but a castle now in ruins. From this castle (represented in our Engraving) an extraordinarily fine view can be had and could be commanded, and was of it tossed about by some terrible earthquake. A few particulars of the taking of Calatafimi—for the least of the world's many dashing exploits—may not be amiss at the present period to refresh the memory, especially as at the time several conflicting accounts were about contemporaneously in print. The following is from a Neapolitan officer who took an active part in the affair:—

It was on the 15th, at half-past seven, that Garibaldi's small army reached the village of Vita, about a mile from Calatafimi. This town and the surrounding hills were already occupied by the Neapolitan General, Landi, with a column of 3000 men. On the top of the village of Vita there is an open space, with a little brushwood and a good deal of heath, which the world scarcely expects to see in a place of so much stated fields. The country all about is one continued chain of hillocks, as far as the eye can penetrate through the rows of trees and the masses of the vegetation. An officer sent on at Garibaldi's order informed of the presence of General Landi's column he went to a neighbouring hill to explore the position of the enemy. In the meanwhile the Neapolitans advanced in small columns, with the apparent intention of attacking the rear of Garibaldi's column whilst marching, when their columns relied, unmasking a strong body of 1500 men, supported by a battery of four field-pieces, which opened a murderous fire upon the head of the column of the volunteers. The first column was headed by Garibaldi himself, the second by the Hungarian Colonel Tuke, and the third by Colonel Carini. The battery was then given to the Sicilian sharpshooters commanded by Genioli. Protected by the fire of these sharpshooters, the 7th column of Garibaldi, formed of volunteers from Favia, and the battalion of Bixio, men from Bergamo, charged with such vigour that in less than half an hour the Neapolitans were completely routed and dispersed. The attack of the two companies had been supported by a body of men led by the son of Giuseppe Manin. To these three thousand at first charge would be impossible. A young officer of Pavia, son of the celebrated physician Carioli, followed by four of his soldiers, threw himself upon a gun of the General Landi and took it from it. Such was the moral effect produced on the Neapolitans by the loss of this gun that the order for retreat was given, and the retreating columns were then abandoned by the Royal troops one after another. In spite of this, however, the Neapolitans fought very well, and with an obstinacy which is a better omen. There was a moment in which a battalion of Royal sharpshooters, being short of ammunition, used stones instead of balls, and fought with the bayonet in the ranks. These exertions, however, could not stop the backward movement of the Royal army. Both retreated first on Calatafimi and afterwards on Alcamo, always closely followed by Garibaldi, whose cavalry could not be brought into play till towards the end of the action. The Neapolitan troops which took part in the affair were the 10th battalion of Carabiniei, the first of the 19th Regiment of Infantry, 200 horsemen, and four pieces of cannon, in the whole 3000 men. The fight commenced Garibaldi had scarcely 500 men, but a reserve of 500 came up afterwards. Eighteen of Garibaldi's officers were wounded, amongst whom were Bixio, Manin, Sirtori, Hanna, Missori, Tuke, Carini, Palazzo, Maiocchi, Griscotti, and Nullo. Nino Bixio, whose death was incorrectly announced, and Sirtori were the most severely so far. "The action of Calatafimi," adds the writer of the letter, "was a fight of honour. Garibaldi was always to be found where there was a difficult position to be taken. God saved him in the battle." Garibaldi's two Franciscan monks, who fought like heroes. A third friar led to Garibaldi's camp a band of 300 Sicilians armed with excellent English muskets.

MARRIAGE STATISTICS.—The tables prepared by the Registrar and his assistants for the year 1858 disclose, as usual, some curious facts. For instance, it appears that in the year in question 2 boys of the ages of 14 years of 18 and 16 of 16 married to a boy of 17; a young woman of 19 was wedded to a lad of 16 years of age; girls of the age of 14 were married to men of 21; in all, 26 of the wives were only 15 years of age, 184 were 16 years, 1016 were 17, 3126 were 18, while the greatest number of women—4,111—at the period number marry at 20 than at 19; indeed, more marry at 30 than at 25 or at 18. Five widows only, out of 3,679, all of them under 25 years of age, married, catching an active bachelor of 65. A girl of 17 was "scarlined" to a man of 61; and another young creature of 18 was married to a man of 90. Between the age of 89 more married to women of 80. A spinster of 70 was wedded to a bachelor of 81; but the huge majority of the women who married at this period of life of course are widows.

A LETTER FROM SEBASTOPOL.—Mr. Gowen writes from Sebastopol, July 16, as follows:—"Yesterday I raised and brought alongside the wharf the 50-gun frigate Kastchyda, the frigate the large masts of which stood upright in the centre of the harbour. She was very heavy, weighing 1 thousand tons. This, I believe, the first frigate that was ever raised whole, and she is in good condition. Since we last I have raised some twelve vessels, among them four wooden and one iron war-steamers, of 200-horse power each. The steamer Vladimir, of 400-horse power, will be raised in a few days. . . . Since my last letter I have paid great attention to the reparation of the cemeteries where your brave countrymen are buried, and have commissioned the contractor to keep repairing. I think that some person should be appointed to look after the graves, for it is a pity to see persons from the Russian Government, who could not even count 500 graves, covering over twenty square miles of territory."

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SHATARD.—The vote sent by Professor Duncan Forbes, the well-known Oriental scholar, nominating to Sir Frederic Madden and Mr. Hunter, is entitled to the History of Egypt from the Time of the early Invention of the Guns in India till the period of its enthralment to the Mamelukes of Circassia, and will be published, we are told, in a few days by Messrs. Longman and Co., of Paternoster-row.

H. H.—How can Black possibly make by taking Rook in the game referred to? If Queen takes Rook, then the other Rook would certainly take Queen. You appear to have played over the game without reflecting that White has pawn for Q Kt.

L. T.—Problem—It is difficult to determine. We will endeavour to be have the advantage in future.

L. T.—Subscribers to the "British Chess Association" should communicate immediately with R. Walker, Esq., M.A., Sydney-terrace, Cambridge, on the subject of the forthcoming meeting at Cambridge.

PROBLEM No. 859.
By ALFRED KEMPE.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White, playing first, mates in four moves.

MATCH BY CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN READING AND BRISTOL.

The two games which have been pending many months between the Chess Clubs of Cambridge and Reading have just terminated, Reading, very much to the credit of the Berkshire amateurs, scoring both games. The second game we must content ourselves by giving only one this week, reserving the second for a future Number:—

GAME I.

WHITE (Philidor's Defence.)		BLACK
(Reading)	(Cambridge).	(Reading).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th	1. P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	P to Q 3rd	2. Kt to Q B 3rd
3. P to Q 4th	P takes P	3. P takes P

4. P takes K P	B P takes K P	4. Kt to K 5th
5. Kt to K 5th	P to Q 4th	5. P to Q B 3rd
6. B to Q 3rd	Kt to K R 3rd	6. P to K B 4th
7. Kt to Q B 3rd	P to Q B 3rd	7. P to K 3rd

8. K Kt takes K P	P takes Kt	8. P takes P
9. Q to K R 5th (ch)	P to K Kt 3rd	9. K to Q 2nd
10. Q to K 5th (ch)	K to Q B 2nd	10. K to Q 3rd
11. P to K Kt 4th	Q B to Kt 5th	11. P to K 5th
12. P to K R 4th	P to K R 3rd	12. Q to K 2nd
13. Q to K 3rd	P to K Kt 4th	13. P to K 6th
14. P takes P	Q takes Kt (ch)	14. K to Q 4th
15. Q to K 2nd	Q to K 2nd	15. Q to K 3rd

(Painfully hazardous, but boldness was their only chance in so desperate a position.)

16. Q to K 7th (ch)	K to K Kt 8q	16. K to K 5th
17. Q to K 6th (ch)	K to K R 8th	17. K to K 4th

(If K to B 3rd, White could have Castled, winning easily.)

18. Q to K 8th (ch)	K to B 3rd	18. K to K 3rd
19. Q to K 6th (ch)	K to Q B 4th (ch)	19. K to K 4th

(This appears to be the only move to prevent immediate mate. White now forces a draw by perpetual check.)

20. Q to K 8th (ch)	K to K 4th	20. K to K 4th
21. Q to K 8th (ch)	K to K 4th	21. K to K 4th
22.	R takes K R P	22. B to Q 6th

(We should have preferred playing 22, Q to K 3rd, 23, R to K 5th, 24, Q to K 4th, followed by R to K 4th.)

23. Q to K 8th (ch)	K to K R sq.	23. Q to K 3rd
24. Q to K Kt 8th	P to K Kt 3rd	24. Q to K B 6th
25. Q to K 8th	P to K Kt 4th	25. Q to K 3rd

(The exchange of Queens tended much to relieve the position of Black. Q to K 3rd was very strong.)

26. P to K Kt 3rd	P takes P	26. P to K Kt 5th
27. P to K R 4th	P to K R 4th	27. P to K R 6th
28. P to Q B 4th	P to Q B 3rd	28. P to Q R 3rd

39. K to Q 6th	P to K Kt 7th	39. K to K 2nd
40. P to K Kt 4th	R takes Q B P	40. P to K Kt 7th
41. P to Q Kt 4th	R to K 5th	41. P to K 7th

42. R to K 6th (ch)	K to K 3rd	42. K to K 3rd
43. P to K B 5th	P takes K B P	43. P takes K B P
44. P to Q Kt 5th	Q P to K 7th	44. Q P to K 7th

(Had we taken the Queen's Pawn, White would have played P to Q Kt 6th, and Black could not have saved the game. Why not have played P to Q Kt 6th?)

45. K to K 3rd	R to Q 8th (ch)	45. R to Q 8th (ch)

BRITISH CHESS ASSOCIATION.

The meeting of this association will be held at Cambridge on the 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st inst., under the presidency of the Rev. Hon. Lord Lyttelton, assisted by a local committee consisting of the Rev. W. Frost, Mr. St. John's College; Rev. M. M. U. Watkinson, M.A., Trinity College; G. D. Liveing, Esq., M.A., St. John's College; Rev. H. W. Reeve, Esq., M.A., Trinity College; Rev. E. W. Wilkinson, M.A., Christ's College; C. B. Clarke, Esq., M.A., Queen's College; and Rev. Thomas Wilkinson, Trinity College; the secretary and treasurer being Edward Walker, Esq., M.A., Trinity College.

The meeting will be held in the rooms on o'clock a.m. on the 28th with a meeting of the subscribers, and immediately on its termination will commence the play according to the following plan, which is considered a very favourable one:—

This will be followed by the matches between clubs, which will be contested by a limited number of players on each side, and will consist of one game only either single-handed or in consultation; in the latter case it is recommended, on the ground of economy of time, that the number of players on each side not exceed two in number. The prizes in these encounters will consist of sets of chessmen, boards, &c., the value of which will depend on the club subscription, one-half of the cost, and the contending clubs the other half, in equal proportions. It is necessary to state that all the clubs intending to enter the lists must communicate with the secretary at an early period.

The time of commencement is to be as to the local committee on or before the 15th day of August next, after which period the committee reserve to themselves the right to refuse the entry, if they think proper, any applications for admission. Every competitor on entering his name is to pay an entrance-fee of one guinea, unless he or she have previously paid a subscription to that amount; and, if more than sixteen gentlemen enter their names, the local committee are to select that number out of the gentlemen entered as their names to form the tournament. Should more than the required number of names be entered, it will be the duty of the committee to arrange a supplemental tournament, with prizes dependent in amount on the funds at their disposal.

The whole of the players are to be present at the close of the meeting of subscribers on the 30th day of August next, when they will be paired by lots; and any player who shall not then be in attendance is to be considered to have resigned his place in the tournament, and the local committee are to nominate another player in his stead.

It is rumoured in military circles that the vacant baton will be conferred on Lord Clyde, as an especial mark of her Most Gracious Majesty's appreciation of his Lordship's brilliant services.

The Canaries and twice that quantity to Spain and England.

LITERATURE AND ART.

How many of our readers remember Sir Frederick Trench, the worthy Baronet, dilettanto-architect, and ex-M.P., who used every year to make her Majesty a present of a magnificently-bound Bible? We are afraid that Sir Frederick's name does not dwell very permanently in the minds of a fickle and capricious generation. Some few, however, may, when they pass Ducinea Burton's triumphal arch, facing "Anastasius" Hope's columniated gates at Hyde Park-corner, remember that Sir Frederick Trench, ecstatic in his hero-worship of the Duke of Wellington, was the most active member of the committee that insisted on hoisting the equestrian statute of the Great Arthur to the summit of the arch in question. But it is not with the Arch, or its commemorative statue, that Mr. Wyatt has to have anything to do. Sir Frederick was an enthusiast in London improvements. He delighted to indulge in visions of a London to be made as architecturally handsome as ever Turin or the Christopher could have desired it to look, and one of his dreams was of a complete embankment of the Thames. There is a pamphlet of his some five-and-thirty years old, and called "The Thames Quay" in which he revels in the idea of lines of handsome houses, with a broad, granite roadway before them, fringing the borders of the silent, high way. Apathy and "vested interests" have hitherto prevented the realisation of this plan, as magnificent as that of the legendary Monarch who did—

In Xanadu
A magnificent domo dicree.

There seems, however, some definite chance of the worthy old gentleman's project assuming substantial proportions. The Select Committee, which numbers among its members Mr. Locke and Mr. Cubitt, specifies which numbers among its members Mr. Locke and Mr. Cubitt, are of opinion that a Thames quay is not so very impracticable an undertaking:

Nor gainst it is there urged a vote
By great Sir Christopher Wren.

The proposed embankment is to extend from Westminster to Queenhithe,—that is, from the new Houses of Parliament nearly to London-bridge. The new barrier are not to be limited to the Temple Gardens docks within the embankment, with a sprouches beneath the roadway. A railway is to skirt the road. Total estimated co st one million,—just a ninth part of the money we propose to spend on our volunteer fortifications. There is this million to come from? From the hackney-carriage duties? From the imposts on coal and wine, expiring in 1862, or from John Bull's imperial pocket? Herein lies the hitch.

We have more in our travels been on the Rhine than the Amour, but we must make the honour of meeting an American gentlemen who was proceeding thither as Consul for the United States, and who, if our remembrance serve, had the American flag run up in the form of an umbrella in order that in the hottest of most tempestuous weather he might still be under the shelter of the stars and stripes. Very few people know anything about the Amour; it is terra incognita even to the "special correspondents," Queen's messengers, and writers of the Travellers' and Cosmopolitan Clubs. For this reason we may expect great, though not universal, popularity (the book being an expensive one) for Mr. T. W. Atkinson's recently-published "Travels on the Amoor and in the Recent Acquisitions on the Confines of India and China." A strange, hardy, adventurous man must be this Mr. T. W. Atkinson. We happened to be in the capital of the Czar four years since; just after his traveller's return from the wilds of Eastern Siberia. For years he had been wandering, with a wife as heroic as Garibaldi's Anita, in those inhospitable regions, often depending for his sole subsistence on his rifle and his fishing-rod. He was the pioneer of Europeans in the Altai Mountains and St. Petersburg the magnificent water-colour drawings he had made during his pilgrimage, and of looking with great interest on the little son who had been born to him in the course of his sojourn in the Altai. Mr. Atkinson's wife has given the sonorous appellation of "Alla-tor-tam-tam-Tchibonak." There's a name for you, O ye Roos-Maillas and Maria-Janes!

The literary pension-list for 1860 is before us. It is of the old pattern, slightly improved; and we only wonder that the First Minister of the Crown has been enabled to do so much with so inconsiderable a sum. The multitudinous sisters of Dr. Lardner have each a yearly donation of £25. Miss Jewsbury we are delighted to perceive, is to enjoy a pension of £100 per annum; Dr. Blakey, the scientific writer, £100 a year; and the pleasant, and now veteran, poet, Mr. Harrison Ainsworth, £50 additional to the pension of £75 which he already receives. Dr. Bigsby and the Rev. Henry Logan likewise have each £100 as pensions.

Whatever we do, under the earth, or in the air above it, will the custom-house authorities of the Continent seize next? It was but the other day that the French dounaniers took their leave of the coaches of the stoke sharpshooters who were coming to England; and now we find a correspondent of the Levant Herald bitterly complaining that the officials at Tagnarog, in Southern Russia, have seized a German sausage, his property, merely because it was wrapped up in a copy of the said Herald. To add injury to insult, the gentleman ate the sausage, and told him that the prohibited newspaper would be forwarded to the Imperial Chancery in St. Petersburg.

In this country we have such a mania for all of the scrapbook mania, and ladies no longer ravage society with fat quartos bound in green and gilt, and demanding contributions to their books, under the capacity of income-tax collectors or of robbers of the Rhine. But abroad the album still flourishes in its pristine splendour. The latest addition to the list in the magnificent volume presented to Marshal Vaillant by the city of Milan in memory of the Italian campaign. This album is composed of twenty-eight beautiful coloured drawings, including a view of the Duomo, the Carnival at Milan, episodes of the battle of Magenta, the Tower of San Martino, portraits of Victor Emanuels, Fumagalli, Castoldi, and other distinguished Lombardian artists and dilettanti chiarisani. The total cost of this gorgeous present to the Marshal exceeded fifteen thousand francs, or no less than hundred pounds.

Mr. Kerle's Committee on the South Kensington Museum have concluded their labours, and reported the result thereof. They propose an annual grant of £37,000 a year for additional buildings, which are to be of a more permanent character than the present "Brompton." Some reference to architectural beauty will also be made in their design. From the British Museum only the zoological collection and the Natural History will be removed to Kensington, together with such duplicates and superfluities as cannot be conveniently retained in the overcrowded Bloomsbury.

Portrait photography is entering into a new phase. The mania is now for diminutive little full-length portraits which may be printed on a visiting-card. The shop-windows are full of these little portrait galleries, the arrangement of effigies being of the most heterogeneous description. On either day we recognised Prince Napoleon, Lord Palmerston, Thompson, the Grand Duchess Stephanie, Mr. Keeley, Count Persigny, Signor Gingillini, Lord Campbell, Sidney Herbert, and Tom Sayers, all of a row. Surely the juxtaposition of "Heliogabalus and Jack the Painter" is coherent in comparison with this.

With very great pleasure we have to notice the death of Mr. Alfred Dickens (brother to the illustrious English author), who expired at Manchester, from a frightfully rapid attack of illness of a pulmonary nature, on Friday night week. Mr. Dickens was the travelling and inspecting engineer under the Local Government Act, and was on an official tour when he was stricken down. He had been, we believe, a pupil of Brunel, and was in every respect an able and accomplished gentleman. His vocation did not lead him to the pursuit of letters, but his tastes were eminently literary; and he will long be remembered as a brilliant conversationalist and humorist in those circles of which he was the ornament. Personally, Alfred Dickens was one of the warmest and kindest hearted of men, and dies deeply, as he is extensively, regretted.

OUT-DOOR AMUSEMENTS.

AUGUST.

THERE are few months which produce more delight to the English country gentleman, the sportsman, and the agriculturist, than the month of August; for while, on the one hand, the cultivator of the broad acres reaps the produce of his industry, upon the other the out-door sportsman finds that the stubble and turnip fields ready for himself and his well-trained pointers and setters to commence the campaign against the feathered tribe. Thus has Thomson, the poet of "The Seasons," described the rural scene —

A gaily-chequered, heart-expanding view,
Far as the circling horizon round
Unbounded tossing in a flood of corn.

Not has Pope, the Jacobite author of "The Rape of the Lock," been less happy in—

And, nodding, tempt the joyful reaper's hand.

Harvest-home, like many other rural festivities, has sadly degenerated from the days of old, when the advantage or disadvantage of a land we live in space will not permit us to enter upon. Suffice it to say, in former days our ancestors were in the enjoyment of joy at the end of harvest, and carried out their previous labour with considerable merrymaking, thus imitating the customs of the earlier ages. They crowned the last waggon-load of corn with garlands, and, amidst music and dancing, they invited one another to meet at the festive board, as at this time, in the ancient days, the Jews were thanks homefeted; and a plentiful repast, custom existed, which, trifling as it may appear to the worldly mind, was productive of much happiness, that of giving to every one concerned in the harvest—man, woman, and child—a present of ribbons, lace, or sweetmeats.

Partridge shooting, cricketing, archery, are now in their prime; and on the 12th the lover of the trigger may commence his operations against the grouse, with the pleasing anticipation of more than this year, and the sportsman may walk through the stubbles after the nut-brown partridge. During the last month the principal business of the gunmakers has been to the production of the aristocratic owner of one of the ancestral homes of England down to the plebeian in the smoking-room of a small public-house, the guns and supplies of such stores as are absolutely required, there will be a constant drain upon your purse for dispensable ones, and it moreover behoves every sportsman, a gallant, if not a thoroughbred, to study economy in his sporting transactions, to lend himself to unprincipled tradesmen, who, acting upon the principle of "live and let live," make use of all such covers have more money than brains, look upon them as fair game, and make the most exorbitant charges for needless "jobs" and articles not absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the fowling-piece; it creates a most unpleasant feeling, for no moment of the day will the owner be free from annoyance, and, moreover, he will find, on mature reflection, at no point out that the book won't last very long, that one of the stanchions is considerably damaged, that the pistils of the rubber are worn out, that the mainspring is broken, that the signal-ballards are worn out, that the gallopeal requires altering, that the topsnat-shroud is quite rotten, that the fore-sail requires, also, a new set of canvas, and stand a breeze, that the forecastle leaks, that the skylight admits a large amount of water, that the compass is out of order, that the ship is full of holes, and that the grip and dingy must be new paid for. This is the system of economy we approve of, and moreover we think that, at the expiration of ten or twelve years, it is cheaper to purchase a new yacht, receiving the difference in value, than subject to buying we yacht much difference of opinion has existed. Some contend that all repairs should be done by the builder, while others contend that builders advocate their being afloat or on the mud. We own we are in favour of the former method, and in that opinion we are backed by Lloyd's surveyors. Under the existing regulations, when a vessel every vessel to be thoroughly dried and a current of fresh air to be ever maintained in her, and much of damage is caused by the neglect of even the careless manner in which yachts are laid up. Sails and ropes are often stowed away damp in a not over-dry cabin, the bedding and cushions are left in the cabin, the bread is huddled together in a moist atmosphere, oats, scalls, brass yokes, and boathooks are carelessly thrown into the dry, warm forecastle, and, as a finale, a coffin is placed between and earth; the cooking apparatus is packed up, in a dirty state, in a hamper of straw; the keys of lockers and cupboards are thrown into a hold, and, in short, the shifting ballast, bunting, gaskets, grapnels, hawsers, hatches, marling-spikes, oakum, swabs, painters, pendants, benches, water-casks, tiller-ropes, and other articles are indiscriminately mixed with mainsails, foresails, jibs, awnings, bedding, flags, charts, compasses, navy-cocks, and innumerable articles, in the dockyard, to plan to adopt it to hold back the captain and men's good-conduct money until every thing is stowed away safe, snug, and "all-standard." We have frequently seen the effects of a contrary advise that no intermediate substance, such as felt or coarse paper, should be placed between the iron and the wood, as it is extremely liable to we have ourselves seen the intermediate material completely wet and clammy with salt water; and a learned and truly scientific friend of ours has told us that the above Bronnet on the iron plan to adopt it to hold back the captain and men's good-conduct money until every thing is stowed away safe, snug, and "all-standard." We have frequently seen the effects of a contrary eminent barrister, and quite as much at home in crossing the bar at Dover as he was in the Court of Queen's Bench, pleaded "the unities" cause" and gained a "rule absolute" for the plan we recommend. Upon one occasion the advocate in question found a ruling a match for Chancery, and upon another occasion he was a suit in Chancery, and upon removing the copper, found a pulpy substance; "ejecting this monstrous mass from the copper, he found that the whole of the bottom over the water like a bird, regaining her former speed. And here we cannot refrain from quoting a remark of the above Bronnet on the subject of copper-bottoming vessels: "I once," he said, "received an offer to build a yacht at £23 a ton; but I declined, feeling that, by paying an extra £10 per ton, I could get a vessel built of iron." The worthy vessel which would outlive double the number of years a 'lath-and-plaster' vessel would, although the difference in construction in the mud without a bidder, and at the end of that period was sold at an 'alarming sacrifice.'"

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.—An interesting return, just issued, shows the number of pictures in the National Gallery, the mode of purchase, the former proprietor, and other particulars. The total sum spent upon the collection is £213,659, and the total number of pictures in the gallery at an expense of £13,659 is the nation's most valuable possession, if not the largest of the kind in the world. Raphael's "Madonna di Casa Alba" is the only painting in the gallery his cost anything like this sum. The nucleus of the collection was purchased in 1824 for £57,000, and in 1826 there was added the sum of £57,000. This collection consisted of thirty-eight pictures, amongst which were Correggio's "Adoration of the Shepherds," Raphael's "Pope Julius II.," some of Claude's most beautiful landscapes, Titian's "Rape of Ganymede," Rubens's "Chapeau de Paille," Hogarth's "Marriage à la Mode," and many other valuable works. In 1843 nineteen more pictures had been added to those mentioned above, amongst which were Correggio's "Mercury Teaching Cupid to Read," Andrea Sacchi's "Vision of a Knight," in 1847, for £1600; "The Adoration of the Shepherds," by Velasquez, for £3050, and many others. The Krüger collection was purchased in 1854 for £3809, some being afterwards resold. The first of these extraordinary pictures, the "Virgin and Child," by Botticelli, was bought in 1855 for £351. In November, 1847, a collection of thirty-one pictures was purchased from the Lombard Baldi Gallery, Florence, for a sum of £7000. During the January of the present year the Beaucourt collection of forty-six pictures was purchased in Paris for £9200. Amongst them are two paintings by Rembrandt, one by Rubens and Cuyp, the Death of St. Catherine, and the "Portrait of Artois," besides other works of undoubted merit and value. A list of the pictures and gifts to the nation will be published, which forms a complete history of our national collection.

NAPOLEONIC RELICS.—A nephew of Prince Demidoff has just opened a "Napoleonic" museum in the island of Elba. It consists exclusively of furniture, clothes, and jewellery which belonged to Napoleon I., and even a curious autograph written by General Bonaparte to Talma, the actor, at a time when the former was regarded as a traitor in Paris. It runs thus: "I have fought like a lion for the Republic, my good friend Talma, and I am rewarded by the ingratitude of the Directory. A day may come on the present when he might make something of me. I for myself more than a match for each General Bonaparte, Kosciusko, and they were the first. Be you double or elsewhere to employ me. You, indeed, are fortunate. Two hours of a morning put you in the way of the public favour, and dispense with. We others must purchase glory at a higher price, on a larger stage, which we are not always permitted to choose. Do but, then, regret your friend, and remember your stage. Who knows whether I shall ever appear on mine again? I saw Mascot another morning, and he is a true Parisian. Love is his language, promises. Will he keep them? That I much doubt. I am reduced to my last farthing. Have you any funds at your disposal? If so, I shall make and promise repayment out of the first kingdom I may conquer. My friend, I am yours most sincerely. Adieu! They did not depend on a Minister of War. Adieu.—YOURS, BONAPARTE."

THE PROPOSED EXHIBITION OF 1862.—The Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 have published their report on the progress made for holding an exhibition in 1862, offered it to the promoters sixteen acres and a half of ground in Kensington-gardens, which they have agreed upon in the required buildings. They stipulate that certain portions of the exhibition buildings shall be of a permanent character, and that the sum of £50,000 shall be paid to them out of the profits of the undertaking, to be appropriated for future purposes. The Commissioners, moreover, fund have created £3,000 to be made up of guarantors who have put down their names for sums varying from £10 to £1,000. A Royal Commission, as well, is in progress, to carry out the affair, as in the case of the Exhibition of 1851. The following is a list of the names of the gentlemen who have allowed their names:—His Royal Highness the Prince Consort figures for £10,000; Matthew Uzielli, Baronet London, £5,000; Baron Rothschild, £5,000; Thomas Baring, M.P., Lombard Right Hon. T. Milner Gibson, M.P.; Lord Ashburton, F.R.S., Bath House, Piccadilly; Sir Charles Lyell, Bart., Bloomsbury-square; Sir Joseph Paxton, Upper Grosvenor-street, £500 each; Royal Cork Institution, Cork, £2000; and the following for £250 each:—Messrs. Montgomerie, Ransome, and May, 118, Piccadilly; Thomas Brassey, 4, Great George-street; Hurst and Reeshel, 156, New Bond-street; Messrs. Cubitt, 24, Gloucester-place, Portman-square; Messrs. Cox, Regent-street; C. Minton, Campbell Potteries, Stoke-upon-Trent; Edward Middlemore, Bartley Old Hall, Northfield, Birmingham; Sir Benjamin Hall, Bart., 50, Belgrave-square; Sir Thomas Phillipps, Bart., 50, Bloomsbury-square; H. Hollins, Potteries, Stoke-upon-Trent; Leo Schuster, Rothampton.

THE WESTERN BANK.—The liquidators of the Western Bank of Scotland have advertised that they are now desirous to pay off all the debts which fell in their hands by the public, and say that they have not funds to do so, but that they are allowed only money not called for. The winding-up has been conducted very creditably to the concerned, considering the large sum of more than five per cent to discharge upwards of £6,000,000 of debts.

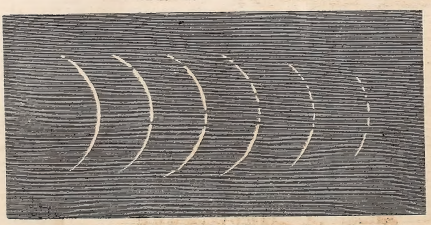
An exhibition of the Arts of Agriculture, Manufactures, and Fine Arts of Italy is to be held in Florence in September, 1861, for which a sum of £30,000 is provided from the public treasury. The general superintendence of the exhibition is entrusted to Count Alessandro Marquis Ridolfi, president of the commission invited with the organisation of the exhibition.

THE ECLIPSE IN SPAIN.

The following account of the eclipse as seen in Santander harbour, by Mr. John Thompson, Master of the Ilgenthorp, to whom we are also indebted for one of the diagrams, we have now pleasure in giving:

Her Majesty's ship Hindostan having been placed by the Admiralty at the service of Professor Airy, the Astronomer Royal, to observe the total eclipse of the sun on Friday, the 6th of July, consisting of some fifty or sixty gentlemen and ladies. On Saturday, at 10h. 30m. a.m. we stopped from our moorings and proceeded to sea at 11h. 30m., passing the farnfund Eddystone Lighthouse; and at 8h. p.m. of the same night sighted Pendeveg Point, Cape Ortegal, on the north-west coast of Spain. Cape Machichoes, a few miles east of Bilbao; and at 7h. 30h. anchored in that bay.

Professor Airy and a portion of the expedition landed with their instruments in a steamer which had been waiting for us, and proceeded at once to the Observatory, and, soon after, the vessels being in the way, did not go into the proper anchorage, but anchored for the night outside.



Next morning we proceeded into Santander harbour, and soon moored about a mile east of the town. We landed the remainder of the expedition here. Several of the gentlemen had been engaged with their observations as to what might be done on our part with the instruments in our possession; and the old adage of "where there is a will there is a way" was fully exemplified, for, after having been absent for nearly a week, a tide-gauge constructed from a boiler-tube, bearings taken from the ship's compass, and other observations made, were found in readiness for the coming event. Several days previous to the 18th the weather was cloudy, with rain, and as the time of the eclipse drew near it was feared that the day would be thrown away, for on the 17th it rained more and grew more cloudy than on any previous day. At 4h. a.m. on the morning of the 18th the clouds were still on the sun, and scanned the sky with intense interest in the hope that we might yet be favoured with a view of the eclipse, which was fixed for the last day fortunate. The sky, however, was very cloudy, and the sun was only occasionally visible, after having been absent for nearly a week. At noon, though the weather was still cloudy, the sun was visible, and we were in hopes that we should have a view of the eclipse. Unfortunately we were late in getting on shore, and the first contact had taken place before we were ready. We could not be helped as set to work with a will, and soon had our instruments on shore and set up, tide-gauge in its place, thermometer hung up in the shade, and a candle lit in a lantern. The sun now was now distinctly seen with the naked eye eating into the sun. Several times the sun broke up in streams of light, and continued to hide everything from us; but fortunately they broke up and permitted us to see the sun at intervals, and watch the progress of eclipse, although the clouds were very thick as it was over. At 1h. 43m. the moon's edge came into contact with the black spot on the west side of the sun. This spot, with the sun's edge, was distinctly seen, large and distinct. As the moon moved on darkness began to creep over the earth, and the light in the lantern now began to show out. At the earth, and the light in the lantern now began to show out. At 2h. 35m. 30s. the sun and moon's centres were 2 and 7, came strongly out, and, as she advanced over the sun, showed ragged and uneven. As darkness increased the moon's edges were defined the outlines of mountains in our vicinity were well defined in the purple distance, and the whole scene had a quiet, solemn appearance. It was true that had now come on, and although at intervals we observed the sun's edges, and, although at intervals we observed the sun's edges, and, although at intervals a more restless individual than his neighbours, and, although at intervals a more restless individual than his neighbours, and, although at intervals a more restless individual than his neighbours to that of night, being of a deep purple hue. The clouds to the S.E., S., and S.W. were dark and gloomy, but to the north of us the sky was clearer, and in some places had no clouds at all; but all was deeply tinged with purple. The outlines of the nearest mountain stood out in bold relief, whilst those behind, being covered with clouds thick and heavy, were not to be seen, but added to the solemnity of the scene; and, altogether, the whole sight was unearthly and magnificent. At 2h. 46m. 39s. the sun appeared outside the moon's west edge, and the change from deep gloom and awe was rapid and magical. The corona and prominences melted away—the deathlike silence and gloom were broken up by sunshine, and the twittering of birds and crickets was heard. Old Father Neptune commenced his play on the rocks with increased vigour, as if indignant at having been stayed so long. A sense of relief, as if from some vague fears, was experienced by all; and each declared his pleasure and great satisfaction at having witnessed so rare and beautiful a sight, and thought that no trouble or distance could be put in the balance against so magnificent a spectacle.

The tides were much affected by the eclipse, it being by a chance coincidence high-water spring tide (or the highest tide). At the time of totality the tide only rose three inches above the level of the previous day, the tide before and after the eclipse having risen thirteen inches. The compasses were altered or affected 28 easterly. The thermometers, six in number, were registered every five minutes, and in the sun fell 17 deg., whilst those which were kept in the shade fell only 5 or 6 deg. The wind at the time of totality was a perfect calm—it previously had been light and unsettled, from the S.W. The excitement experienced during the whole time, and especially when the clouds appeared determined to best us, was intense. Hope and fear combined were visible in every face; the eager countenance, the bated breath during the time of totality, and the long sigh of relief when all was over, testified how deeply each and all felt, and the gratification all experienced.

THE MINISTRY.

AFTER all, and notwithstanding its numerous faults and shortcomings, the House of Commons, when it condescends to take a broad view of a great question, develops itself into a grand spectacle. When it lays aside all petty and personal piques, and ranges itself on its several sides in vindication of great principles, it becomes so imposing in its attitude that we forget months of unruly bickering, and speeches and votes actuated by small motives leading only to a barren Session, dying away from inanition in the latter end of the dog-days. On Monday last our representative assembly was wise enough to give the country one last specimen of its higher character and its more dignified tone. The occasion was one on which, through the medium of a comparatively small question, a fair, open, and regular contest for principles was to be carried ce. The origin of that debate may, perhaps, have been found in a personal desire on the part of some members, both leading and minor in their position in the House, to hait an individual Minister, and through him to strike a blow at the Government; but it is only stating the simple fact when it is said that the discussion, with little and rare exception, and that more of demeanour than of language, from the first assumed and to the last preserved a character which reflected credit on the House as a body, and was commendable in the individual members who took part in the debate. In the first place, the spirit of fair play prevailed, which has previously displayed much eagerness to bring on this last struggle of the Parliamentary year, when he found that his utmost efforts had failed to bring about the result which he desired, had the good taste and the good sense to make a very moderate speech, devoid of temper and undue aggressiveness In the next place, there was a well-considered reticence on the part of the general body of members, and those of the second and third rank who did speak, with scarcely an exception, addressed themselves to arguments founded on facts; and, on the whole, there was displayed a willingness to comprehend the debate in one night, which, considering the time of year and the necessary business still pressing on the last days of the Session, was only decent. And, as no means least, the First Minister and the Secretary for Foreign Affairs showed to great advantage, inasmuch as they threw themselves unreservedly on the vindication of the principle involved, and evinced a proper spirit of good faith towards that particular colleague of theirs whose policy was in question, and who, if unsupported, or only half supported, must have fallen before the combination by which he was assailed.

Beyond, and far beyond, this there was a striking suggestiveness in this discussion, and still more in its result. The prime idea that connects itself with the occasion is, that, despite many forebodings to the contrary, the great bulk of the House of Commons has been found true in its adherence to the principles of free trade as opposed to protection. It must not be forgotten that in the division-list there was to be found in the majority a number of members who not only ostensibly, but actually, belong to the Conservative party, but who, as it seems, faithful to the pledge which that party, as a whole, gave in 1852, had the moral courage of the good cause to prove by their votes that they were men of political as well as private honour. It has been, as we think, no small triumph that the House of Commons has shown itself superior to the organised intrigues of a body of wealthy monopolists, who, by means of a machinery well known and well understood, has been for some time working its wiles on the feelings, and perhaps on the fears, of individual members, bringing every argument and every motive to bear which was calculated to influence the opinions and the votes of gentlemen who, however unattainable in their collective representative character, are, as such, open to every influence which is assailable through their amiable weaknesses. Again, we firmly and conscientiously believe that no small exultation has been felt in the circumstance that this result of the debate on the paper duties has been achieved in the face of the unscrupulous opposition of a newspaper which has itself a great interest in journalism, and which is so confident in its supremacy that its directors suppose that their ipse dixit is sufficient to settle the principle, to dictate the manner of dealing with, and to determine the issue of, every moral, social, diplomatic, and political question. There is much reason to believe for this notion that the power of that journal has well-nigh culminated into a tyranny; and therefore there is something of congratulation in the occurrence of a circumstance which proves that this oligarchical power is not wholly a fact, but is a good deal founded on fancy.

From this, the final party tournament of a Session which ought to be pregnant with lessons for the future, there is to be gathered at once an instruction and a warning. It has shown that it is quite possible to combine and bring into Parliamentary order and unity a Liberal party, in the best sense of that most extended sense of the term. A clear, straightforward adherence to the principles and the policy on which the Government asked the suffrages of the House of Commons last year will ever be found sufficient to temper the undue zeal or the too eager haste of some of the more ardent partisans of liberalism, to discourage the hopes and aid the efforts of those who, as earnest and sincere as the loudest talking of the extreme section of the party of progress, are yet desirous of working out their ends and purposes by means of well-proposed machinery; while such a course is calculated to win those who constitute the real moral position which we now understand by the term Whiggery from their doubts and their fears, and thus to force into one great, powerful but safe whole the elements of a party which has of late been, to some extent, divided on minor points, and has become by so much unmanageable for the objects of legislation, and still more for the steady evolvement of the doctrines which in the main and as a body they all profess. It is, besides, hardly possible that the experience of this Session, capped as it has been by the result of the debate of last night, can be thrown away upon the Government. We cannot but believe that the guiding spirits of the Ministry will have learned that their real safety and their real usefulness consist not in trimming between the two great parties in the House of Commons—now pandering to the Conservatives, and now throwing themselves in the moment of imminent difficulty or danger on the whipped-up support of the Liberals. Let the Cabinet of Lord Palmerston, composed as it is of statesmen of acknowledged ability, and most of them of experience of the peculiarity of the governing machinery of this country, be sure that, if their conduct and their measures are stamped with the impress of the principles which they profess in common with the Liberal party in its most liberal sense, they will find no difficulty in securing a support from that party which will be consistent and uniform, inasmuch as it will be characterised by a desire to accommodate its action to the exigencies of circumstances arising out of the special nature of our system of Parliamentary administration, and, in short, will be founded on that state of things which in relation to a Ministry is to be understood by the phrase, confidence at once in the men and their measures.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Emperor passed in review on the racecourse of the Bois-de-Boulogne, on Thursday week, the troops of the army of Paris, and those garrisoned in the neighbourhood, consisting of twenty-three battalions, twenty-seven squadrons, and eight batteries of artillery. The infantry took up their position with their back to the trihunes; the mounted Chasseurs were opposite, at the other side of the plain, with the Cuirassiers behind them; and the artillery was drawn up in front of the windmill, so that the whole of the troops presented the shape of a parallelogram, the artillery forming the shorter side. The Emperor arrived at four precisely from St. Cloud, escorted by a body of the Cent Gardes, and accompanied by a brilliant staff. His Majesty having been received by Marshal Magnan, who commanded in chief, rode first along the infantry, then the artillery, and lastly, the cavalry, loud cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" arising as he passed. A distribution of crosses and medals had taken place on the 15th of August, after which the troops filed off in admirable style. It is supposed that from 40,000 to 45,000 men were under review.

The Moniteur of Wednesday publishes a decree creating a special cadre of naval lieutenants with fixed residence.

The Minister of Public Worship has issued a circular calling upon the French Bishops to make preparations for the celebration of the Emperor's fête on the 15th of August.

The Moniteur publishes a decree allowing the importation of wool through any customs station in France.

THE EXPEDITION TO SYRIA.

The Emperor, on Monday, left St. Cloud for the camp of Chalons. He was received with immense enthusiasm by the troops, with whom the war is now almost exclusively occupied. On the same day, Tuesday, the two regiments which are to be sent to Syria, and addressed the troops as follows:—

Soldiers—I am sending you for Syria. France hails with joy an expedition the sole aim of which is to cause the rights of justice and humanity to triumph. You will not go to assist the oppressed by force of arms, but to encourage them by bringing back the obedience of his subjects, who are blinded by the fanaticism of a handful of rebels. Your presence will be a living remembrance that good practices—those practices the worthy children of those who once gloriously carried into that country the banner of the Cross. You do not go to make conquests, but your courage and your prestige will supply the deficiency, because wherever the French flag appears it gives, unless more than a great cause prevails it, and a great people follows it.

General Beaufort d'Hautpoul is to command the corps. He has selected for his first Aide-de-Camp M. Boyer, a Major of cavalry, who was long attached to the Staff of Marshal St. Arnaud. According to the Times correspondent the expedition will be composed as follows:—Two regiments of infantry of the line (the 5th and 13th), 3,000 men; the 12th battalion of Chasseurs à Pied, 1,000 men; the 1st regiment of Zouaves, 800 strong; a squadron of Spahis, one of Chasseurs d'Afrique, two of Hussars, and a battalion of Marines, 1,000 strong, company of Engineers. The numerical strength will be close upon 6000 men.

General Beaufort left Marseilles for Syria on Thursday, with 1000 men. In a letter to the Minister of War he says:—"We are not going to avenge offended humanity in a country where they will find a reserve of Christians. We are going to conquer, and that in the name of Republic. He concludes by saying "The wishes of the whole of Europe accompany the expedition."

SWITZERLAND.

According to a decision of the Swiss Federal Council, the occupation of Geneva ceases from the 8th instant; but, on the other hand, all the fifth division will have to take its share in the occupation of the Pays de Thonse, and other fortified places, will be transferred to Geneva, so that in reality the occupation is maintained.

The return of the troops has taken place at Geneva. Officers from all parts of Switzerland, to the number of 1200, assembled on the occasion, and the Federal Council was present. The festival, in short, was general.

The Federal Council has received a note from the Swedish Government, dated July 18, reiterating the intentions of Sweden to support the claims of Switzerland at the Conference on the affairs of Savoy.

THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

The entrance of Garibaldi into Palermo, and the ensuing the convulsion with the Neapolitan Generals for the evacuation of the island, and preparations he is said to be making for transporting troops to the mainland, constitute the chief items of interest. Letters and the telegraphic details of the battle of Melazzo, received last Saturday, are given, in connection with the operations of the Piedmontese generals in our Journal. The official journal of Sicily entirely contradicts the statement that any inhabitants of Melazzo opened bodies of the Neapolitan troops to Garibaldi, as well as the statement that Garibaldi had ordered some of the inhabitants to be shot. The ladies of Palermo are very active in the preparation of lint, bandages, and other stores and medicine. Large numbers of volunteers continue to arrive.

The Sicilian army, with a few exceptions, wears a uniform of the Sicilian army, which is novel enough. With the exception of the Engineers and the Artillery, who are attired as in Piedmont, the other troops differ in the colour of the cloth, the shape of the cap, the collar and cap, and trousers of brown holland. The Carcciatori of the Alps have still jaunty and dashing hats with feathers, but the body of the test of Etna wear deep coffee-coloured blouses, red caps, and trousers of unbleached canvas. The "Sons of Liberty" have on white jackets and trousers, and red Salldo caps trimmed with white. The Artillery are in red tunics, with blue facings, red and green caps trimmed with white, and trousers of unbleached canvas. Their guns and ammunition were formerly. All the battalions are supplied with good and full bands.

Letters from Sicily state that two forts are being erected at Palermo to defend the port. The construction of railways in the island is now in contemplation, and French and Belgian capitalists are causing surveys to be made. The son of Garibaldi has arrived at Palermo in command of the Medici. Several Neapolitan officers who have deserted are stated to have arrived at Palermo; they announce that they are shortly to be followed by others. A battalion of sharpshooters, after the Piedmontese model, is being formed in Sicily.

The Queen of England, a splendid screw steam-ship, purchased by the agents of Garibaldi in the Levant, has arrived at Malta, and sailed straight for Sicily. The Queen of England was well stored with provisions, ammunition, and a large quantity of hospital material shipped by the Ladies Garibaldi Society, London.

NAPLES.

All efforts to conclude an armistice with Garibaldi having failed, preparations are being made for the attack on Naples.

It is reported that the King of Naples has 42,000 soldiers at Reggio, opposite Sicily, and that these troops, it is confidently reported, intend to join Garibaldi the moment he lands.

The Patrie and the Pays of Sunday evening state that a despatch has been received from Naples announcing the organisation of a battalion of 1000 Garibaldian volunteers in Calabria. According to the same despatch the Garibaldians are to march very shortly on Naples, by having been summoned thither by the Garibaldi committee of that city to assume the direction of the Government. Tuesday's Patrie says:—"It is asserted that the Garibaldian volunteers have invested Fort Scylla, in Calabria, opposite Messina." There is, however, no confirmation of these reports.

According to advices from Naples, 300 soldiers, who were on the point of joining Garibaldi had been arrested. The Minister of War had withdrawn the troops from the Abruzzi, in order to concentrate the principal part of the army round Naples.

Improvements are being actively introduced in the Royal army and navy. Commander Capecelosa has been appointed Director of the Ministry of Marine. The renewal of the personnel of the different administrative departments is nearly completed. The office of Private Secretary to the King has been suppressed. The Camarilla has been replaced by persons recommended by the Ministers. The King has visited the head-quarters of the National Guard.

THE PAPAL STATES.

The inhabitants of Montepoglo, near Pesaro, excited by anonymous proclamations, began to divide the landed property of Prince Borghese. Men, women, and children took part in the redistributions of lots. A detachment of gendarmerie re-established order.

Instructions have been sent to the frontier of Naples to seize all inflammatory addresses, proclamations, &c.

A letter from Rome states that on the 1st inst. a body of 1500 Piedmontese volunteers landed at San Stefano, on the Papal territory. They intended to attack Orvieto. General Goyon immediately sent orders to the commander of the battalion of Chasseurs stationed at Civita Vecchia to detach a part of his force for the protection of the threatened town.

The French garrison of Rome, General Goyon having left on the 6th, is commanded temporarily by General Niou.

AUSTRIA.

The committee of twenty-one members of the Reichsrath sat on Monday for the purpose of receiving communications from the Ministers. The sitting lasted four hours. The labours of the committee will require several sittings, as the conclusion of which a general report will be presented to the Council of the Empire, proposing resolutions in reference to pending political questions.

PORTUGAL.

The Portuguese Government has taken a bold measure with its tariff. The Government is determined to keep almost at a bound from one of the most illiberal to one of the most liberal tariffs in Europe. More than three hundred articles are dealt with. In all, the diminution is greatly simplified, so that the annoyances and obstructions of the old system customs regulations will be in a great measure removed. Silk, cotton, woollen, and linen goods—tin, iron, and other metals—leather, and all manufactures in which it forms, and innumerable other articles will be received at a reduction of 30, 40, 50, and sometimes even 200 per cent upon the former tariff. Even this the Prime Minister, Senor Avila, announced to the Chamber of Deputies to be regarded as but first step to a still more sweeping reform which he intends to propose next Session.

SYRIA.

THE DAMASCUS MASSACRES.

It is very sad to relate that the massacres in Syria, now that full details have arrived, were far more shocking and extensive than appeared from the first accounts. A letter from the Rev. D. Thomson, "the oldest missionary in Syria," dated from the city destroyed in Damascus were fully 5000, and that the thousands victims are nearly 20,000 souls. Every day a number of the dead are found out of which in every day swollen by the fresh swarms that flock over the mountains. The committee at Beyrout are doing their best to mitigate the pressure of this great calamity, but with such an small a community do to relieve 73,000 destitute and 10,000 widows without prompt and extensive external aid. Dr. Thomson, through the Relief Committee in London, appeals to the British public on behalf of those who are in want. What will you do with them? All the Christians? Where put them? How feed and clothe them even for a day? We are alarmed at the prospect, and, although everybody here is doing and will do all he can, the demands upon us will be absolutely out ability." We have no doubt that those appeals will open the hearts of Englishmen, and that a sufficient sum will be raised to assist in a work of humanity in which even Moors have taken a liberal share.

The latest accounts from Syria inform us that Damascus is quiet, but that many Christians who had fled in the early moments of future thousand Christian women have been sold at twenty-five piasters each, and are used in the harems.

A letter from Abd-el-Kader gives us an authentic account of the massacres at Damascus. The Emir writes to the managers of the silkworks at Kary :—

Damascus, 27th Zilhage, 1276 (July 28, 1860).

Dear and honoured Friends—I profess myself to you in order to assure you. I have received your honoured letter, dated July 18, inquiring what happened in Damascus. Unfortunate! It is unfortunate that on Monday, July 9, at about two in the afternoon, the war broke out, the occasion of a quarrel between a Moslem and a Christian, who had insulted the Christians. These Mussulmans, in a state of frenzy, rushed armed to the scene of the disturbance, and the quarrel became fierce, and ending at the same time. The Turkish soldiers came to assist them, under the unfortunate idea of aiding the Moslems; but the Christians came with the rockets, and killing, robbing, and plundering with them. A few old Mussulmans, seeing this unjustifiable conduct, let the Turkish soldiers no wish for peace, and, on the contrary, hounded on their soldiers against the unfortunate Christians. The slaughter being, as it were, general, plunderers belonging to every sect. Seeing matters were so desperate I put on my Arabian dress and mounted my horse, accompanied by 1500 of my faithful, taking my Algerines with me, and we were able to save the lives of many, women and children, and these I placed in safety. The fight lasted Monday and Tuesday, during which the rioters did not cease to kill, burn, and plunder the unfortunate Christians. The number killed in the quarter I saw, at Mr. Loanes, the French Consul, and other Frenchmen [in the Christian quarter] could not be made out. In the Jewish quarter no sence of two Mussulmans having been found murdered, which was not the case, the rest of the quarter I was unable to see; but it is the same thing as if it had not one. For me, I deplore the disaster which has unfortunately befallen the Christians, and in the course of twenty-four hours I had collected together one thousand Christians, a number killed in the past twenty, but it is safe to say that the Emir saved about 15,000. I have collected are in safety in my house. I provide them with all they want, and pay them as I can. Remember Christians from me and my family.

ABD-EL-KADER-BEN-MAHI-EDDIN.

The Prussian Consul at Damascus has addressed a despatch to his Consul-General at Beyrout, of which an official translation has been sent to the Allgemeine Zeitung, and appears in their July 31. After some preliminary remarks of no great importance, it proceeds as follows :—

The four principal asylums of the Christians are the Consulates of Prussia, England, Abd-el-kader's Palace, and the citadel. The Consulates of France, Russia, Austria, Sardinia, Belgium, Greece, Sweden, and America, as well as the good sense of the inhabitants of Damascus, the number of the plunderers on the 10th and 11th of July was about 15,000, and as many as 12 were to-day, including the Druse and Bedouin peasants, who kill, but do not plunder as may be left. It is the opinion of the majority of the people that the terrible deal at the entrance of the Mussulman quarters to prevent the entrance of the Christians. But the Christians, before the Mussulmans could reach the Christian quarter, for the 5000 soldiers, regulars and irregulars, who, without even using their arms, prevented the entrance of the Mussulmans into the Christian quarter, and whilst they freely permitted the plunderers to pass in and out, threatened to shoot the Christians who should attempt to defend themselves. Nevertheless, owing to the kindness of a great many of the Moslem inhabitants of the city, the number of the Christian community amounted to 19,000 souls, was saved. Hundreds of Moslem families have Christian fugitives in their houses.

The Governor-General of Damascus has been deprived of office and sent away from the city, together with the chief of the proper tribunals and the Governor-General of Beyrout has been arrested."

THE INTERVENTION BY THE GREAT POWERS.

A protocol has been signed at Paris by the representatives of the five Powers and by the representative of the Porte, providing for the despatch of European troops to Syria. The instructions sent to the great Powers had offered the Sultan their assistance, in order to put an end to the disturbances in Syria; and that the Sultan had accepted the offer of their assistance. The troops are to consist of the European Powers, and which are to be sent to Syria, are not to exceed 12,000 troops; and the proportion to compose of the different Powers is send 9000. They are to proceed to the scene of the disturbances without any delay. The other 6000 men are to be furnished by such one of the great Powers as, upon further consultation, shall appear to be equi-limit. The period for the continuance of the troops in Syria is to be limited to six months. The different Powers will also send commissioners to Syria to inquire fully into the whole matter, in order that all the offenders may be brought to justice.

INDIA.

The Bombay mail of the 7th ultimo brings no news of importance. The death of Mr. Le Geyt, a member of the Indian Council, is announced.

Sir Hugh Rose assumes the command-in-chief in India with a very strong feeling of respect and honour towards him, both by his army and all civilians.

The Madras journals contained strong expressions of regret at the recall and departure of Sir Charles Trevelyan. All sections of the country had presented him with addresses.

CHINA.

Advices from China are—Hong-Kong, June 7; Shanghai, May 30. The following is from the summary of the Hong-Kong China Mail:—

"Since the departure of last mail nothing of a political nature has taken place in regard to our relations with China, unless the absence of the whole of the Shanghai local officers be considered such. Most of the transports which had left for the north (see the Illustration on page 121) have had to put back to the Peiho, and there they must remain until it is uncertain when they may again take their departure, as the south-east monsoon has scarcely yet set in. It is not likely that any general movement will take place until the arrival of the British and French Envoys Extraordinary, who are expected to arrive by the mail now due. Sir Hope Grant and Admiral Hope are still residing at Hong-Kong, but are expected to leave in a very few days.

"The rebels, who have been said to have been put down on so many occasions, only to make their appearance in some other quarter, however, continue, only to make their appearance in some other quarter, however, continue, only to make their appearance in some other quarter, however, continue

THE MAGAZINES FOR AUGUST.

The opening article in Fraser is on a somewhat tantalising subject at this moment. "Concerning Summer Days" is to us this year a very little moment. "Concerning Summer Days" is to us this year a very little moment. "Concerning Summer Days" is to us this year a very little Inlay," by J. B. Waring, printed in lithography and in colours by Vincent Brooks. We made mention of this important contribution to art-literature and the admirable workmanship bestowed upon it at the time of its publication, and have now pleasure in again calling the attention of our readers to it.

The name of the designer of the beautiful marble font of the Baptistery of Sienna is not handed down to us; but it must be a work of the early part of the fifteenth century, since in 1417 we read of a contract between Lorenzo Bartholi (Ghiberti), goldsmith, of Florence, and the cathedral authorities, giving to the said Lorenzo two panels in the font, to be executed in bronze gilt, the subjects being St. John Baptising Christ, and St. John before Herod. One of these panels was completed in ten months. Ghiberti, who was engaged at the same time on his great work, the gate of St. Giovanni at Florence, executed these two only, which Vasari, in his life of Lorenzo, states were greatly admired by the Siennese. Donatello succeeded him, and executed the Birth of St. Joachim, about the year 1433. Later in the same century Lorenzo di Pietro (Vechietta da Sienna) executed certain small figures in bronze for the same work, and finished a relief in bronze which had been commenced by Donatello. Jacopo della Fonte also executed two stories in bronze for the same work, and the manner of these was imitated by Lorenzo as closely as possible. It was from him that the baptismal font received its final completion. The friezes of the base and entablature of the font are ornamented with gold inscriptions on a blue enamel ground, containing no information as to the artist.

THE GARDEN OF ACCLIMATISATION IN PARIS.

The Zoological Society of Paris is an institution of recent foundation, having been established early in 1854, at the suggestion of the celebrated naturalist Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire. Although so young in existence it has already received support from every quarter of the globe. Napoleon III. has inscribed his name at the head of the list of its patrons, and the society now reckons among its members twenty-one sovereigns, seventeen princes, and many distinguished naturalists of all nations. The object of the society is to introduce, to acclimatise, and to domesticate in France every useful or agreeable variety of animal or vegetable. Hitherto the successful results of the efforts of this society have been most encouraging, and several species of animals—for example, a herd of yaks from Thibet and a flock of Angora goats—have already been acclimatised, their numbers having so much increased as to permit of certain individuals being distributed over different parts of the French empire. Encouraged by this success, the society thought it advisable, for the extension of its labours and their more direct supervision, to create an establishment specially set apart for the purposes of acclimatisation; and, at the suggestion of Count d'Eprémesnil, the new garden just completed has been arranged in such a manner as to provide for the reception and conservation of the different exotic acquisitions that may be obtained from time to time, whether animal or vegetable.

Situated in the midst of the Bois de Boulogne, of easy access to the curious, the Garden of Acclimatisation will afford a new and interesting attraction to such persons as like to combine instruction with recreation. The Parisians are already delighted with this addition to the charms of their Bois de Boulogne; and, certainly, Paris, as the great centre of Continental civilisation, is well adapted for popularising the principles, and making known the results, upon and for which the Imperial Zoological Society has been instituted. Probably it will not be long before we commence to rival our neighbours in this as in every other improvement, as the question of establishing a similar garden in this country has already been mooted.

The Paris Garden has been erected by a company whose shareholders, without having been animated by a sordid spirit of gain (for, even in our day, there are certain enterprises for the progress of humanity that are undertaken by persons who are strangers to such a sentiment), will not be losers by their intelligent outlay. The profits are expected to arise from the entrance-fee to be paid by visitors, and by the sale of animals, eggs, plants, and seeds produced in the establishment. The site for the garden, comprising nearly sixty acres, was granted gratuitously to the society by the municipal administration of the city of Paris, on the sole condition of devoting it exclusively to the proposed objects. Thus liberally favoured, it could not start under more agreeable auspices, more especially as it will be supported by the good wishes and contributions of specimens by the learned and powerful of all countries.

Our Drawing of the Garden of Acclimatisation represents its large stables and stallhouses viewed from the small rivulet destined to the reception of new piscine specimens. The arrangements for the propagation of its future inhabitants are on a very complete scale, as may be supposed when we mention that such men as the Count d'Eprémesnil, M. Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, and M. Drouyn de Lhuys have superintended them throughout. In conclusion, we adopt the idea of M. Saint-Hilaire when we say that such an establishment is like a book of nature, in which we may learn the laws, the conditions, and the secrets of animal and vegetable life, study the world and its products, and become conversant with the mysteries of the creation, thus elevating the mind by degrees to the contemplation of all the works of the great Creator.

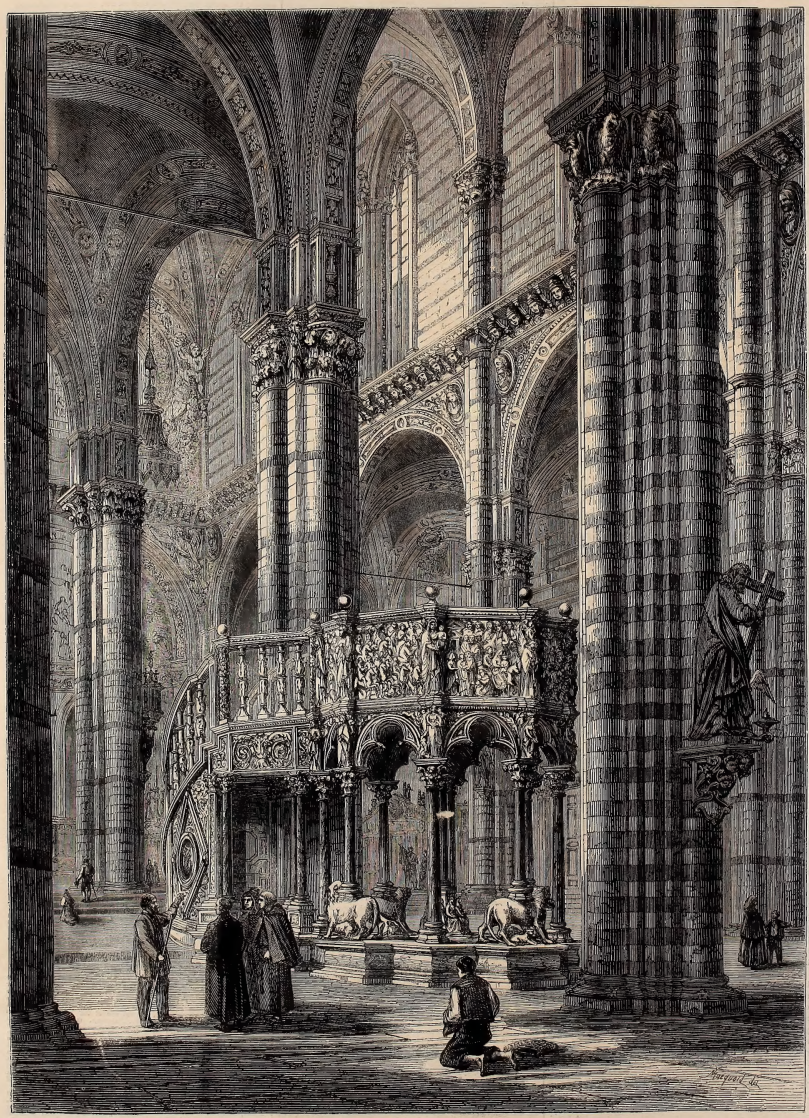
they are bills of a useful and practical kind. The measures which it has been found necessary to sacrifice are of a far more popular description. Without adverting to the unfortunate Reform Bill, or to the withdrawal of the valuable Bankruptcy Bill, we may express our regret at the loss of the City Corporation Reform Bill, slight as it was to be, and still more at the abandonment of the Criminal Law Consolidation measures, which Consort, receiving Prince Hesse, and Princess Louis, left Osborne at ten o'clock a.m. on Monday, and reached Aldershot Camp at half-past eleven. The Queen and Prince Consort, where a special train on the South-Western Railway was in waiting for them, conveyed Her Royal party to the private station at Vauxhall, where they proceeded in five Royal carriages, escorted by a detachment of Life Guards, to Buckingham Palace, where Her Majesty's dinner was served at a quarter to two o'clock. The Queen and Prince were received on alighting from their carriage by Viscount Canning, the Right Hon. Edward Ellice, Earl Spencer, Viscount Castlereagh, Lord Harris, Lord Alfred Paget, Colonel Grey, Major Teesdale, and Lieut.-Col. the Hon. D. Ba Bingham, C.B.



Her Majesty held a Court in the afternoon at Buckingham Palace, at which the Queen Lewis, accompanied by Count Grabau, presented the Danish audience of the Queen. The Most Rev. Dr. Longley, Archbishop of York, did homage for the Queen's temporalities as Archbishop of York, and was sworn of the Privy Council. The Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell, Deputy Clerk of the Closet, was in attendance on this occasion.

At half-past eight o'clock in the evening her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with Princess Alice, Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, Princess Helena, and Princess Louisa, left Buckingham Palace for the terminus of the South-Western Railway at Nine-elms, where a special train was in attendance. Mr. Berens, Railway at Nine-elms, where a special train was in attendance. Mr. Berens, Railway at King's-cross to present to Edinburgh the Hon. Sir C. were the Countess of Desart, the Hon. Beatrice Byng, Colonel the Hon. D. Bingham, and Lieut.-Col. Grey. At Clay Lane Junction, where the Royal party were Res, and Major Elphinstone, R.E. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness the Prince Consort were received on the platform by the Marquis of Winchester, Lord Steward, Earl Spencer, Viscount Castlereagh, Lord Harris, Lord Alfred Paget, Colonel Seymour, Colonel Grey, Major Teesdale, and Lieut.-Col. the Hon. D. Bingham, C.B., Groom in Waiting. The Royal party occupied five carriages, and were escorted to the South-Western Railway station by a detachment of Life Guards. The Right Hon. Sidney Herbert and Dr. Balay joined the Royal suite at the station.

The Queen and Prince Consort performed during the night with unerring accuracy, the train running at an uniform speed of forty miles per hour.

The Queen and Prince arrived at the Aldershot station at ten minutes past eight o'clock on Tuesday morning, and immediately proceeded to the Royal pavilion in which they breakfasted with Princess Alice.

In the course of the morning the Queen, accompanied by the Prince Consort and Princess Alice, visited the camp, and was received by her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

The following abstract of the proceedings in both Houses of Parliament on Friday, August 3, appeared in our town edition last week.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY, AUGUST 3.

THE MASSACRES IN SYRIA.

Lord STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, in moving for certain papers respecting the affairs in Syria, reviewed the painful events that had recently taken place in that part of the world.

Lord WODEHOUSE said the Government could not consent to the production of some of the correspondence asked for, believing that public production would be attended with much inconvenience to the public service.

After a few observations Lord Stratford de Redcliffe withdrew his motion.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:—Dungeness Rights (Scotland), Coals of Arsol, &c., Act Amendment, Crown Debts and Judgments, Debtors and Creditors Act Amendment, Railways Act (Ireland, 1851), Lunacy, and County Elections Bills.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY, AUGUST 3.

SAVOY.—Lord J. RUSSELL, in reply to Lord J. Manners, said that her Majesty's Government had acquiesced in the proposition on that of Portugal, the subject of the neutral provinces of Savoy. In consequence, however, of the objections on the part of Prussia and Austria, the question remained in abeyance.

SYRIA.

On the motion for adjournment till Monday,

Mr. EICH called attention to the papers respecting the disturbances in Syria.

Lord J. RUSSELL, in answer to the question by the hon. member, said he could say that the Turkish Government seemed disposed to make up for their culpable indifference by first bringing to justice the late Governor of Damascus, who had locked on whilst the murders were being perpetrated by wholesale; and by sending out troops to put down the movement and to protect the Christians from further outrage. The disturbances, it appeared, did not originate with the Druses. We regarded the Mahometan Commissioner Fuad Pasha as one well lately prepared a Commission of inquiry, and to this the Turkish Government had consented. The French Government had declared that the atrocities were of such a magnitude that the Powers of Europe ought to take measures to prevent the possibility of their occurring again. The French Government stated that troops were to be in European Powers, and Russia and Great Britain at once acceded to it, France at the same time declaring that she had no intention of acting alone in the matter. It was at length agreed that the resolution of the Powers should take the form of a despatch, signed by them all. A despatch had been signed by the five great Powers, and was also signed by the Turkish Government. It was proposed to be furnished by France. It was provided that when the troops had done their work they should be withdrawn from the Commissioner and that the Turkish Government should find sustenance for the troops during their stay. The French Government had declared that the troops should not exceed five months. He would produce the protocol in a few days. It would then be for Parliament to say what sum it would vote any papers.

Mr. BRIGHT considered that the intervention by force took rather the appearance of a settlement than a mere temporary measure of relief and temporary interference. He was not so objectionable as interventions usually were. But the motive for the intervention was to protect the ignorant and the poor, and for its purpose the preservation of the integrity of the Turkish empire. The Christians were the weakest party. In fact the Christians were unarmed, and had ensured millions to be squandered and thousands of valuable lives to be lost. Turkey was a bankrupt state, and her interest was to be one that ought to be neutralized. He trusted, therefore, that her Majesty's Government would not interfere in the matter, but in such a way as would not involve the expenditure of a single shilling or the sacrifice of a single life.

Lord PALMERSTON considered that the hon. gentleman had taken a prejudiced view of the question. He (Lord Palmerston) thought Parliament had not stood still: it had made progress, and would make more progress if allowed to do so. He considered that approval of the policy indicated by the hon. gentleman.

The motion was then withdrawn.

ITALY AND SICILY.—Lord J. RUSSELL, in reply to Mr. Griffith, said that the Governments of France and Great Britain had entered into an arrangement not to interfere in the affairs of Italy and Sicily.

THE TREATY WITH CHINA.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply to Mr. Ker Seymer, said that the ratifications of the treaty with China, the time for the payment of the indemnity under the Treaty of Tien-Tsin, had received very little attention from the bankers. Her Majesty's Government, who had not fixed any time for the payment of such indemnity, had not as yet received any part of it.

Some votes in Committee of Supply upon the Civil Service Estimates were taken.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Royal assent was given by commission to a number of bills, public and private.

The Industrial Museums (Scotland) Bill passed through Committee, as did the Thames Conservancy Bill, the Metropolitan Police Magistrates Bill, and the Admiralty Jurisdiction Bill, and the Superannuation Act (1859) Amendment Bill.

The order for the Committee on the Landed Property Improvement (Ireland) Bill was withdrawn.

SYRIA.—The EARL of SHAFTESBURY inquired whether the intervention of the great Powers in the affairs of Syria was to be confined to the settlement of the disturbances which now existed, or were to be extended to an interference with a more general supervision? He also asked for information, to put this question owing to the inexplicable interest he entertained of the Emperor of the French.

—Lord WODEHOUSE replied in the negative. He stated, with regard to what the good Powers, and that their intervention would be confined strictly within the limits of the present disturbances. He could not say to the amount of money which now prevailed in Syria.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE expressed an opinion that the intervention beyond this temporary object would be both a view to the ultimate and complete settlement of the affairs of that country.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

DEBATE UPON NOTICE OF THE PAPER DUTIES.

In COMMITTEE on Customs Acts.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER brought forward his resolutions for the reduction of the duty on foreign paper. He was aware that the subject involved some difficulties for consideration, a very minute one in reference to revenue. Neither as it respected trade would it be easy to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion in the absence of the articles; but there any such dismal prospects within the manufacturers anticipated; and if the duty were taken off, only proved that the manufacturer had been paid more than was his due. The question did not stand exclusively on the advantage which the paper trade would derive from the reduction of the duty. It would be some advantage, the question, however, was in connection with a great commercial principle, and the House must consider it as it related to a contract with France. He had heard with surprise that the duty on paper was to be reduced from the customs duty as proposed, but that of the excise was within the sense and meaning of the treaty with France. He (Mr. Gladstone) did not understand it in that way. In the 7th article of the treaty in the English version, and still more clearly in the French version, the duties of customs and excise were distinguished, and he thought the meaning and relative still more clear and definite. There were certain articles in the treaty which formed the basis of the negotiation, and the understanding between the parties was clear, and the principle was that there should be no prohibition of any article imported into a country, which was not equally applicable to articles produced in the country. This was plainly to be gathered from the diplomatic correspondence on this subject. It was not to be inferred from the correspondence that France was bound to allow paper to be given would teach the protectionists of France the doctrines of free trade, rather than encourage them in adhering to those of prohibition. Whatever France was not an exporting country as regarded rags. He was bound to say that the spirit manifested by France, in the Treaty of Commerce, liberal, and accommodating manner, and the terms of readiness had been arrived at were of a most satisfactory character. The duty of excise on paper had been made into House—as, for instance, the article of coal; and now the French Government had consented to the consolidation of the duties, and to their being in respect to the article of paper. If by inadvertence we had bound ourselves to the act of 1845 we might easily get rid of it; but as the matter stood now, we were actuated by justice, prudence, and a regard to principle, and if, in fact, such a contract had been entered into, he might be prepared to move a continuing a state of analysis in that trade, we were bound not to avail ourselves of any error which could in no possible way be of advantage to ourselves. Then to keep them in that state of suspense which the amendment of Mr. Thomas Baring proposed to create—because of the question of the paper duty coming on the ground of humanity to them it would be desirable to settle this question at once, that there was no other case in which the raw material from abroad entered, and the manufactured article was admitted free of duty, there were the cases of leather and silk, both in their manufactured state being admitted free, as hides and spun silk bearing a high or prohibitory export duty in France. The Government proposed to make the duty on rags equal to that which was the duty on rags in foreign countries for the raw material. He met that question by a flat denial. The duty was not an import duty on the raw material of rags. It was only an exercising abundance of the raw material that gave a duty of about 200 tons of rags a year, besides which not more than half the paper manufactured was made of rags. The paper we export was that which was made from the rags which we import. Most of this went to America, where France was at liberty to send, and where we competed successfully with her. But in reference to publications of which paper was the raw material, by British law, as it stood, the publisher could not purchase foreign paper except at a duty of 25s. a cwt., while the competing article in the shape of a printed book was admitted at a duty of 15s. a cwt. This was an inequality which was the result of a system of taxation of foreign literature. He could not doubt that the sense of honour of the House, as well as its sense of policy, would dictate to them the acceptance of a resolution which for the last time would deal with the question of protection; and he declared that there was no necessity to look to the question of the paper duties except in connection with what might be called the royal family of the press.

Mr. PULLER said he entirely concurred in the policy desiring to prejudice the question of a reduction as a future period of the customs duty on French paper contained in the treaty with France. He was not opposed to such reduction. He argued that, looking to the vast interest involved, the paper duties ought to be dealt with by a separate Act. Such was the usual practice; and he would contend, in the face of all sarcasms, that their case was a real and proper exception to the rule which had been principally laid down in reference to his arguments. As to the treaty with France, he contended that its intention was as far as England was concerned, to encourage the export of rags from that of France there was no appearance of pressure for the revulsion of import duty on foreign articles; and it was not to be supposed that the duty was "inexcisable" in the treaty referred to all excisable merchandise. The spirit of the treaty was to give the paper-manufacturer protection against unfair competition.

Mr. CARDWELL and Mr. Crossley supported the resolution.

Mr. MAGUIRE, in opposing it, urged that the protectionists of France ought not to be encouraged in their views by the abolition of the paper duties. He protested against the withdrawal of the import duty at a moment when the manufacturers were overloaded by the excise duties.

Mr. MARSH having spoken in favour of the resolution,

Sir H. CAIRD thought the House had been drawn into two treaties, one of which was made to depend on the French treaty, and the other on the principle of free trade. He could not agree to the resolution. The duty on paper at the present time was a duty of 15 per cent; but when the duty was imposed by Mr. Gladstone in 1853, with due reference to the then existing duties, it was 20 per cent. The Government in the case of the duty, they stood in a very disadvantageous position even now; while, if the present resolutions were carried, they would be placed in a position which would be far worse. Looking to the construction of the treaty, it was expressly worded that the duties of excise and customs were to be distinguished, and that the excise duty which might be imposed.

Mr. HUBBARD opposed the resolution, as did also

Mr. HENLEY, who argued against it.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that the question at the objection taken to the assertion that the resolution was founded at once on justice and expediency. He should not have thought it necessary to address the House, and would give an advantage to one of the parties, while a refusal and audit consideration of the question would be equally advantageous to both. He was returning to the latter interpretation. Yet this was the course which they had pursued in the case of the treaty with Belgium, and they had found it attended with great benefit from the works of the French treaty. It was quite obvious that the treaty of commerce was to be considered as a whole. The Government, therefore, felt it to be their duty to take this country at a duty of the same amount as the extra duty levied on the same commodity when imported from France. He could not admit that the policy of the proposition seemed to him the same which had always been pursued in reference to the paper duties. He thought that it was the duty of the House to remember the Government, and to induce the House to grant the duty levied on the same commodity when imported from France. He could not admit that in all Government undertakings the actual expense always exceeded the estimates formed at the time. If they commenced a duty commencing at 15 per cent the nation would never know when it would stop.

Mr. DISRAELI did not think it necessary to enter into the question of free trade and protection, considering that the question of the paper duties and rights should be applied with prudence and consideration, and without any reference to the principles of free trade or protection. He had taken what was in question now was avowedly independent of and separate from the commercial treaty. He had been recently criticised severely for what he called the excise duty on paper was inexpedient at this particular time; but the question was not one of free trade, but that by Mr. Gladstone himself. He (Mr. Disraeli) had opposed the abolition of the duty on paper, and he doubted that the particular commodity of paper came within the stipulations of the French treaty. He thought the House ought to be very careful how it dealt the amendment of Mr. Puller without a division.

The House then divided on the amendment of Mr. Puller, and the numbers were—

A division was then taken, and there appeared—
Against it	... 206
	... 53
Majority for the Government	... 153

The other resolutions, the effect of which was to reduce the duties on paper to those of 15 per cent, were then put and agreed to, Mr. Puller's amendment having been negatived.

The other business was then disposed of, and the House adjourned at half-past two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Game Certificate Bill, the Naval Discipline Bill, the Savior Member of Council (India) Act Amendment, the Lunacy (Ireland) Act Amendment Act (1860) Amendment Bill, were read a third time and passed.

The Ely Tithe Commutation Bill, the Bankruptcy Bill, and the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854) Continuance Bill were read a second time.

The House then went into Committee on the Bankruptcy Bill, which intended to proceed with the Poor Law (Ireland) Continuance Bill, the Ecclesiastical Courts (Ireland) Bill, the Bankruptcy Bill, the Lunacy (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill, the Fortifications Bill, the Indian Army Bill, the Land Improvement (Ireland) Bill, the Land Improvement (Ireland) Bill, and the Ecclesiastical Schools Bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

At the morning sitting the Roman Catholic Charities Bill passed through Committee, as did the Industrial Schools Act Amendment Bill.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in the evening sitting, on the motion for the third reading of this bill, Mr. DODSON made some remarks in opposition to the bill. He said that the Roman Catholic community had not in some remarks or his on a previous occasion—which in substance amounted to the same thing—that the Roman Catholic body had not been subject to the evils attributable to the Royal trusts—said that in the main he adhered to the opinion he had expressed on that occasion. The Roman Catholic charities and estates in Ireland were now placed.—Sir E. COLEBROOKE having spoken against the bill, Mr. Fergusson, Mr. Hadfield, and Sir C. Wood, but there was no division, and the bill was read a third time, and passed.—Several bills were read a second time, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

STAMP DUTIES (DISTRICT REGISTRARS' FEES).—The report on the resolution passed on this subject was brought up and agreed to.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL moved that the order for the Committee on this bill, which, with several consolidation bills, had come down from the Lords, be discharged, on the ground that there was no time to discuss them this Session. He proposed to take the same course with regard to the two other bills. The Government would early next Session bring the bills forward again, and would be glad to receive any hints for the consolidation of the criminal law were then severally read and discharged.

The Land Improvement (Ireland) Act Amendment Act, 1860 (Public Money Lending), Bill was read a second time.

The Lords' amendments to the Prisons (Scotland) Bill were considered and agreed to.

The order for the Emblements, &c. (Ireland), Bill was read and discharged. The order for the Land Improvement (Ireland) Bill was discharged.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

Mr. HUBBARD gave notice for next Session of a measure to amend the law of Parliamentary election.

THE UNION OF BENEFICES BILL.—After a preliminary discussion the House went into Committee on this bill. Clauses up to 14 were agreed to after a long discussion, the remaining clauses, the object of which were to facilitate, several other clauses were agreed to, and at a quarter to six the House resumed, and the committee were then discharged.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Earl of ZETLANDMORE intimated his intention of opposing the Earl Grey Pensions Bill, which was read a first time.

The Ecclesiastical Commission Bill was read a second time, after a long discussion, on the motion of the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, the object of the same being to prevent the sale of Church property.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:—Local Governm ent Act (1858) Amendment, Intermediate Education (Scotland), and Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bills.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Almost the whole of the morning sitting was occupied in discussions upon the motion for going into Committee of Supply.

Mr. ARDERLEY moved for a copy of the plan and estimate of Captain Fowke for the alteration of the National Gallery, and of any other plan for that purpose now in the possession of the First Commissioner of Works.—After a discussion the motion was withdrawn.

Sir E. BAGGE moved that the appropriation and audit of the moneys voted for the Civil Service Estimates were insufficient and unsatisfactory, and required early consideration.—A lengthened discussion ensued, and ultimately the motion was agreed to.

The House then went into Committee of Supply, when the vote for the Royal parks, &c., was considered, but it was not disposed of when the sitting was suspended, at five o'clock.

THE PAPER DUTY.

Mr. BRIGHT gave notice that to-morrow (Friday), on the motion for the adjournment of the House, he would put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the paper duties, and also call the attention of the House to its position with regard to those duties.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Mr. H. BAILLIE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any negotiations were pending between this country and the Court of Spain. Power, and, if so, whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to withdraw the representative of this country at the Court of Spain unless the slave trade and systematically to disregard its treaties and engagements with this country.

Lord J. RUSSELL replied that Spain had made such an application, and Prince Lucien Murat had been duly received, and about the same time five great Powers. Austria, however, had hesitated, and, although she did not positively object, she declined to take any part in the matter at present, and the admission of other Powers into the councils of the great Powers. Her Majesty's Government had not been absolutely consulted in regard to the good claim for admission, but Portugal would also follow, as there existed a great jealousy between Portugal and Spain. Spain was unable to pay the country, and would, no doubt, put in her claim, and then there would be nine Powers between whom to adjust the balance of power in Europe. The reason of objection that it was very undesirable that the present state of affairs should be disturbed by the admission of Spain during the recess. The Government would not consent to any change.

FORTIFICATIONS (PROVISIONS FOR EXPENSES) BILL.

On the motion for the second reading of this bill,

Mr. R. JAMES moved as an amendment "That before proceeding further with this bill it is expedient that the House should be in possession of some further information as to the entire cost of construction and efficient maintenance of the defences of the country, and that the Government should, during the recess necessary to be incurred by the country in respect of such proposed new defences and the annual charge for the same, and that it is not to embarrass the Government, but to induce the House to grasp before they proceed into particulars of so large a character as to the cost of the works that in all Government undertakings the actual expense always exceeded the estimates formed at the time. If they commenced a duty commencing at 15 per cent the nation would never know when it would stop.

Mr. DISRAELI did not think it necessary to enter into the question of free trade and protection considering that the question of the paper duties and rights should be applied with prudence and consideration, and without any reference to the principles of free trade or protection. A barrel for the general company; and altogether the day was one of much interest and pleasure.

THE LONDON SOCIETY AT OPEN-AIR SERVICES FOR WORKING MEN.—Last Saturday evening the Bishop of London preached in the open air to a large congregation assembled and collected from the men and children in one of the most uncivilised portions of the outskirts of the metropolis. The place selected for the service was a piece of waste ground hard-by the Great Western Railway, on the east of Wormwood Scrubs. The men who had assembled and others are chiefly employed in the making of bricks and pottery ware, while it is dotted here and there with gipsy tents and other temporary habitations, which are not calculated to exhibit better shelter elsewhere. The Bishop selected for his text the 16th chapter of St. John, 12th verse: "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." The subject of his discourse was the duty of the men in their generation wiser than the children of light." The latter part of the Bishop's address was full of encouragement and hope, and at the close of the service the Doxology was sung, and the Bishop pronounced the benediction. The vast congregation then dispersed.—On Wednesday evening the Bishop of London addressed a congregation, composed of a similar class of persons to the one present at the episcopal address on Saturday evening, and this service in the hope that some persons might be induced to come and hear the Gospel preached, and not only that, but that they might have his printed announcement intimating that all those were especially invited to attend the next Wednesday evening's service. The Bishop's intention, but may yet be desirous to hear the Gospel preached. Notice was given out the Divinities, and of the Sunday, between 10 and 4.—The service assembled—most of them working people, in their working clothes—on Monday evening, and the Bishop will commence the open-air services for the working classes at St. John's District Church, Walham-green.

The Queen has decided on having the whole of the iron-plated steam-floating batteries, now in harbour at Chatham and elsewhere, put in a state of thorough repair and ready for full service. Extensive naval operations have commenced on several of that class of vessels at Chatham Dockyard.

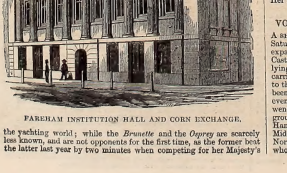
A court-martial at Chatham has sentenced Privates Hogan and Wellington, R.M., to penal servitude for the respective periods of life and twenty years, the former for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, the latter for theft and acts of mutiny, and the latter for threatening the life of his Colonel.

The Army and Navy Gazette states that discussions have sprung up among the officers of the Royal Artillery stationed in Ireland into the state of the Sidcup, &c., and that Mr. Ricardo, M.P., the chairman, has retired. He will be succeeded by Mr. P. Peel, M.P. The remaining members of the commission are for the present pursuing their labours, which promise to be of a lengthened character.

There has been some fine practice with Armstrong guns this week at Eastbourne, in presence of the Duke of Cambridge and other military officers. A target in a tower was the target. The range was 1032 yards. Twenty-three shots and shells were fired; one shell burst all the other shots hit the tower within a space of three feet by four feet. The upper part of the tower was found to be cracked from top to bottom, and a clean breach made in the side.

MUSIC.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA closed on Saturday evening last, after a most brilliant performance of the "Prophète." This London "Season" is now at an end, and for some months to come music will be transferred to the provinces, in the shape of musical festivals, musical tours, &c., which will give occupation to our principal English celebrities, and to some of the foreign favourites as may think proper to remain in England. In October or November next a new musical season will begin of unprecedented brilliancy at that time of the year; for then, it appears, the two great musical theatres, Her Majesty's and Covent Garden, are to open for English opera, the enterprising Mr. F. Smith (notwithstanding his failure last year) having "taken" Drury and Harrison Company.—From such a competition some remarkable results may be expected. The Royal Italian Opera season "has proved," as we said at the time, a most successful one, and the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, is about to be transferred to the English Theatre, while it has been still more famous as the "Opera Buffa." The Gye and Mapleson troupe is speaking, but houses and brilliant performances, but it has scarcely produced anything that could be called a new. His company and the performances have, however, been nearly the same as those of previous years; the only new performance of note having been Balfe's "Talisman," a work called new opera—for an old piece, unknown to the public, is equivalent to a new one—having been Glück's "Orfeo e Euridice." Of this beautiful work, and of Signor Mario's performance of the principal character, our admiration has already been fully expressed. But the most gratifying circumstance, to our feelings, has been the revival of Rossini's "Barbiere," which, instead of giving only a small number of admirable performances, has been a long-engagement, and the theatre "overflowed with success" under a limited engagement. The whole season, maintaining the supremacy she has held so many years, and showing herself able to maintain it for many years to come.



The concert in aid of the funds of the WINCHMORE-HILL NATIONAL SCHOOLS, which we announced the week before last, took place at the pretty residence of Mrs. Mellor, Collge, and was a concert of the numberless instances in which music lends her assistance to the most benevolent objects. The concert was given in the grounds of a Winchmore-hill, adjoining the metropolis, has been without any school for boys, the only accommodation for the education of the children of the poor being at the girls' school, which is also in a bad state. To remedy this crying evil a committee of gentlemen was formed, the chief of whom are Messrs. Lowe and Mellor, and a subscription of schools capable of accommodating 250 children—70 boys, 60 girls, and 120 infants—under separate master and mistresses, together with the requisite residence for the master. In addition to the schoolrooms there are a washing-room, a bookroom, and other conveniences, and the whole is to be kept strictly for the health and comfort of the children. The entire works were completed at a cost of £1200, exclusive of the land, which is one of the numberless instances in which music lends her assistance to the most benevolent objects. RUINS OF CASTLE ACRE PRIORY." BY R. LEITCH.

THE ruins of Castle Acre Priory, in Norfolk, dedicated to SS. Mary, Peter, and Paul, are amongst the most picturesque objects of the kind which survive it as memorials of the piety of our forefathers. It was founded by the Earl of Surrey in 1085, in acknowledgment of the courtesy shown to him in the Abbey of Clugny when on a pilgrimage to Rome. It is seated on the Nar; and the walls originally included twenty-nine acres of ground. A very beautiful painting of these picturesque ruins, by R. R. Leitch, was in the Royal Academy Exhibition just closed, from which we produce an Engraving. Mr. Leitch shows himself possessed of a fine eye for the more impressive features of his subject, which he transfers to canvas with charming effect.

INSTITUTION HALL AND CORN EXCHANGE, FAREHAM.

THIS building, which has just been completed and opened to the public, forms a point of interest not only to the town to which it is an ornament, but to the surrounding agricultural district of which it is the focus, on account of the superior accommodation it offers to both buyer and seller of grain. The portion of the building which appears to the left of the central entrance contains the reading-room, library, and hall of the Fareham Literary Institute, and which was erected for the use of the old Fareham Institution, from which it takes its name. It was inaugurated some twenty-four years since by Lord Brougham, but that institution failing into decay it was transferred to the present institute, who are merely the occupiers. The building itself was put up to auction, and purchased by an enterprising townsman, Mr. George Boorn, who has added the Corn Exchange and large stores and offices behind. These form the portion which appears on the right of the central entrance, and complete the block of buildings which is the subject of our Illustration. The erection of these buildings will undoubtedly be a great boon to the agriculturists of the district, as giving a larger scope for that legitimate competition which is so necessary in order to maintain the balance of supply and demand.

THE ROYAL YACHT SQUADRON REGATTA.

THE annual regatta of the Royal Yacht Squadron was held last week at the Isle of Wight. On Tuesday the cup given by the Prince Consort was sailed for by cutters of the squadron over fifty tons in measurement, and was a time race according to Acker's scale. There were five entries for the Prince's cup, namely—

Yachts.	Tons.	Owners.
Osprey	49	Colonel R. W. Huey.
Marina	62	Sir A. Bannerman.
Brunette	70	Colonel Dunmore Smith.
Arrow	102	Mr. T. Chamberlayne.
Lulworth	80	Mr. J. Wall.

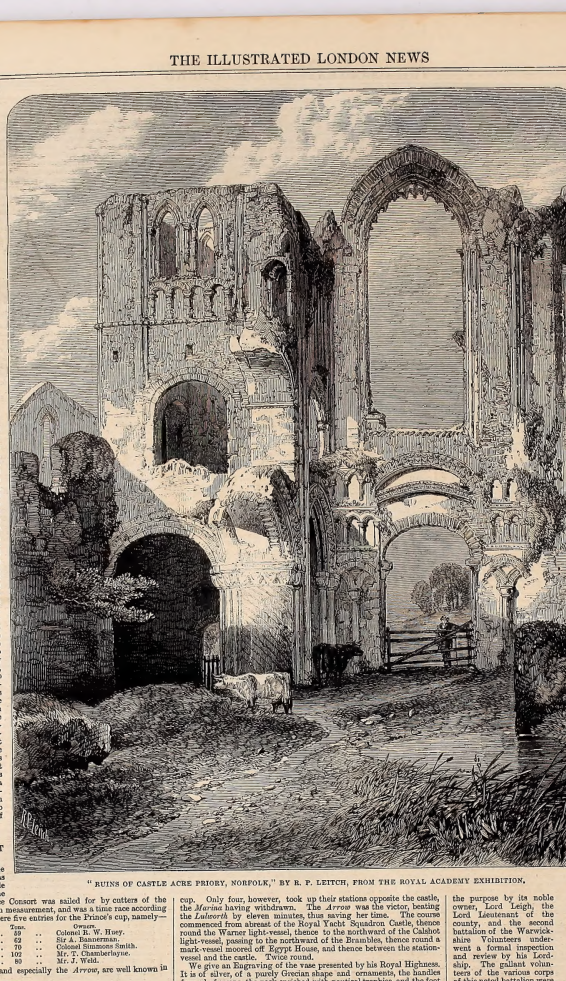
Of these the Lulworth, and especially the Arrow, are well known in the yachting world; while the Brunette and the Osprey are scarcely less known, and are not opponents for the first time, as the former beat the latter last year by two minutes when competing for her Majesty's cup. Only four, however, took up their stations opposite the castle, the Marina having withdrawn. The Arrow was the victor, beating the Lulworth by eleven minutes, thus saving her time. The course commenced from abreast of the Royal Yacht Squadron Castle, thence round the Warner light-vessel, thence to the northward of the Calshot light-vessel, passing to the northward of the Brambles, thence round a mark-vessel moored off Egypt House, and thence between the station-vessel and the castle. Twice round.

We give an Engraving of the vase presented by his Royal Highness. It is of silver, of a purely Grecian shape and ornaments, the handles formed of swans, the neck enriched with nautical trophies, and the foot with laurel fillets and acanthus. The low reliefs on the body represent the triumph of Neptune, and on the reverse side a council of sea gods, attended by Nereids and Tritons. Messrs. Hunt and Roskell were favoured by the command of his Royal Highness to manufacture this elegant and appropriate vase, which is from a design by Mr. T. Brown.

On Wednesday the members of the club dined together at Cowes; and on Thursday her Majesty's cup was sailed for by schooners of the squadron over 100 tons. This was a time race, a quarter of a minute per ton being allowed. The Aline, owned by Captain Thellusson, carried away the prize. On Friday the annual ball, attended by 200 of the aristocracy, was held at Cowes; and on Saturday the £100 prize given by the squadron was competed for by vessels belonging to any Royal yacht club. Ten vessels were entered for this race, of which nine started; and the Lulworth, owned by Mr. Weld, came in first, Her Majesty and various members of the Royal family were present.

VOLUNTEER EVOLUTIONS ON HAMPSTEAD-HEATH.

A SHAM fight upon a small scale took place on Hampstead-heath last Saturday afternoon. The scene of the fight was not the fine, open, expanse of heath stretching away to the west and north of Jack Straw's Castle, but the upper heath, as it is called, a spot small in comparison, lying between that point and the Spaniards, on the north side of the carriage road leading from Hampstead to Highgate. The people flocked to the spot in incredible numbers, and no organised attempt having been made to preserve the ground set apart for the manœuvres, had it even been practicable to maintain it, a scene of confusion ensued which went far to mar the whole ceremony. The force that appeared on the ground consisted of four corps—namely, the West Middlesex and the Hampstead Rifles, under the command of Major Compton; the 7th Middlesex (Islington), under Captains Hebbert and Dennis; and the North Middlesex, commanded by Captains Ross and Cameron. The whole of the space, in fact, in which the fight was to take place was occupied by a huge straggling crowd. To do the volunteers who took part in the fight justice, they behaved throughout with good temper, showing no sign of annoyance at the crowds who hung upon their skirts and hampered all their movements.



The plan of the "fight" was apparently as follows: The attacking force, consisting of the 7th Middlesex (Islington), under Captains Hebbert and Dennis, and the North Middlesex, commanded by Captains Ross and Cameron, marched on the ground by a circuitous route leading from the Spaniards, sheltered by the trees and brushwood, and took up their position under a heavy fire from the skirmishers of the defending force at the bottom of the valley on the northern side, where, after some manœuvring, they formed into line, and were saluted by a well-directed volley from two companies of the West Middlesex on the ridge of the hill. The attacking force then sent out its skirmishers. The first company selected for this service was the 7th Middlesex. Their manœuvring amongst the furze and brushwood was exceedingly steady and soldierlike, but the well-directed fire of the West Middlesex and Hampstead Rifles compelled them to retire, and their positions were then taken up by the 1st company of the North Middlesex, which had previously been acting as a covering force in case of necessity. This company now advanced in skirmishing order, whilst the 7th Middlesex acted as the covering battalion, and kept up a well-directed volley firing, some of the volleys being delivered with a precision that elicited much applause. The great point on the part of the commanders of the attacking force appeared to be to drive the defenders from their position on the hill, and as the attacking force advanced the gallant Major who had the command of the defending force observed a movement of the reserve, consisting of two other companies of the North Middlesex, and, acting upon the principle that "discretion is the better part of valour," shifted his quarters to the north-east side, whence he made a most determined defence, until at the end, being overpowered and short of ammunition, he beat a rapid though steady retreat by the only loophole left for escape—namely, the opening into the Hendon-road, on the north-western side of the heath.

REVIEW OF WARWICKSHIRE VOLUNTEERS.

THIS event came off on Monday, July 30. The magnificent park of Stoneleigh was thrown open for the purpose by its noble owner, Lord Leigh, the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and the second battalion of the Warwickshire Volunteers underwent a formal inspection and review by his Lordship. The gallant volunteers of the various corps of this noted battalion were also honoured on this occasion by being presented by the Marchioness of Aylesbury, in the name of the ladies of Warwickshire with a handsome silver bugle. The programme of the day included targe-shooting, in which four members of each of the following corps took part —Coventry, Rugby, Warwick and Leamington, and Stratford-on-Avon. The successful competitor, Mr. Clark, of the Warwick and Leamington Corps, received at the hands of Lady Leigh a valuable silver cup, and also a medal. Mr. Reddar, a youth of sixteen, the next best shot, had the honour of being presented to her Ladyship. The fête was altogether a great success, and the universal approbation of the company present, expressed as it was in the most enthusiastic manner, must in some measure have repaid Lord Leigh for his patriotic kindness in opening his noble park for the occasion. The proceedings of the day were brought to a close by an address from his Lordship to the battalion. He expressed the gratification that it had afforded to Lady Leigh to have the honour of presenting the first prize for successful rifle competition to the 2nd Warwickshire Volunteers; and, having congratulated the corps on the efficient manner in which they had acquitted themselves, on the occasion, he said he might repeat what he had said in Calthorpe Park the other day, that, in his opinion the Warwickshire Volunteers were a credit to the country, and stood second to none in the provinces. He hoped that this would not be the last occasion on which a volunteer force would gather in the old park of Stoneleigh Abbey, and he looked forward to seeing on a future occasion both battalions joined in a review there.

On Saturday afternoon the London Scottish Rifles joined the Queen's Westminsters at Waterloo-place, and proceeded to Battersea Park, where a series of evolutions were gone through with great military precision. —At the same time the 19th Middlesex, or Hornsey Rifle Volunteers, assembled in the grounds of Mr. William Bird, of Crouch Hall, near Crouch-end, to receive a compliment at the hands of the ladies of Hornsey—Mr. Bird inviting his neighbours to witness the presentation of a handsome silver bugle to the corps.—The Essex corps were reviewed on Saturday afternoon in Hylands Park, near Chelmsford, by Major-General Wood, Commandant of the Camp at Colchester. The Essex and Uxbridge Yeomanry Cavalry and Artillery and several metropolitan corps also took part in the review. Altogether about 3000 volunteers of various classes were collected on the occasion.

FIELD-DAY AND SHAM FIGHT OF VOLUNTEERS ON HAMPSTEAD HEATH.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE race meetings for the ensuing week commence this:—Radcliffe on Monday; Egham and Congleton on Tuesday; Oxford, Lenbury, and Ainsdre on Thursday. The Cesarewitch has closed with 165 entries, and the Cambridgeshire with 184. We observe from a recent article by Admiral Rous, in Bailly's Magazine, that, in his opinion, two-year-olds should not come out in future before May 1; and that the number of them in training has gradually increased from 48 in 1797 to 576 (and 9 yearlings) in 1859. On the third Aldcroft has received a riding reward from the Earl of Stamford.

Volligrar won the £100 prize at Middlesborough—the Cure being second, beating fifteen others.

The principal cricketing and rowing fixtures for the ensuing week are as follows:—Weymouth Royal Regatta, and sailing match of Brixham Yacht Club (first day), on Monday; Great Yarmouth and Scottish Yacht Club Regattas, on Thursday; Tukin Turn Amateur Rowing Regatta (Cumberland), and Royal Western Yacht Club Regatta (Plymouth), on Thursday and Friday; and Challenge Cup Sailing Match of the Clyde Model Yacht Club, at Largs, on Saturday.

The cricket matches are—the County of Surrey against All England—the last great one that will be played in the metropolis this season—which was commenced on Monday morning on the Surrey Ground, Kennington Oval, was left drawn on Tuesday, owing to the wet state of the ground, as it went it was one of the best matches of the season; and Mr. Lillie's batting (on the Surrey side) was a masterpiece of cricket. Surrey had, apparently, the best of it. The cricketer's programme for next week stands thus:—Kent (during the Sixteen of Kent v. England (return), at Canterbury; and the Gentlemen of Surrey v. Gentlemen of Middlesex, at Lecrcroft on Wednesday the Gentlemen of Kent v. Gentlemen of Marylebone Club, at Canterbury; and on Thursday the A. E. E. v. Twenty-two of Macclesfield; and Kent v. Sussex, at Beckenham; at Macclesfield: the Surrey and Southgate (return); at Southgate; and the U. A. E. E. v. Twenty-two, at St. Leonard's; and on Friday the Gentlemen of Kent v. I Zingari, at Canterbury.

The grouse prospects were never more melancholy, both in the north of England and Scotland, and many a moor will require an entire jubilee. As regards partridges, there is pretty nearly the same tale to tell, as the wild bird has been thinned out terribly of late years, and mowing-machines have made matters still worse for them.

AQUATICS.—The boat-race between Eton and Westminsters Schools—a real which always excites great interest—came off yesterday week. A gallant struggle resulted in the triumph of Eton.

The Royal Victoria Yacht Club Regatta commenced on Tuesday with the race for a prize value £50, open to small yachts belonging to any Royal yacht club, which started at 11 o'clock, and ran over a course of 20 miles to and below the water-line. Time race, about one minute per foot; a prize of £10 for the second vessel. The following is the form attached to the Regatta:—Nereus Boxer, round the Nab Light and the Black Buoy of the Middle, and back to the water-line. The Nereus Boxer to keep to the left of the starboard hand, rounding the Nab Light, leaving it on the port hand; returning to and leaving the Black Buoy of the Middle hand, rounding the Black Buoy of the Middle, and leaving that on the port hand, and back to the starting-vessel, passing the Nab and Spit Fort. The following is the result of the race as follows:—Gyde, 40 m., Sloo; Glance, 4h. 9m., 40s.; Thought, 4h. 10m. 18s. The prize therefore went to Thought, made, and was owned by Mr. Ratsey, on account of the allowance of time from one vessel to another.—The boatmen of Ramsgate and the weather are both proverbially uncertain and unadvisable. The only race for that day was for a Prize of £30 for Small Cutters. The course was from the Pier, proceeding to the Ramsgate, round the Warner light, thence to the westward, rounding the Calshot light-vessel and the Ramsgate Pier-head, and back to the Pier to finish. The distance about 40 miles. There were two yachts entered—the Fairy (Mr. Percy) and the Queen (Mr. Chamberlain); and after a close contested race, the former came in first by one minute forty seconds.

CRICKET.—England Eleven v. Twenty-two of Shugborough: This was a three days' contest, commencing on Thursday week, in Shugborough Park, the property of the Earl of Lichfield. On Friday, on Saturday, the Eleven winning by nine wickets. The following is the score:—Shugborough, 72 and 46; All England, 84 and 35 (with one wicket down).

The Duke of Argyll has accepted an invitation to preside in the autumn at the annual meeting of the Lancashire and Cheshire Association of Mechanics' Institutions, and to distribute the prizes and certificates. It will be also successfully competed in the record examinations of 3000 adult male and female members attending such schools of science and literature.

On Saturday last the ceremony was gone through of running over the first out of the Great Eastern Railway—but not the last—of the new second Kinross with Tillicoultry, where the Edinburgh and Glasgow line terminates. Some excursionists were taken over the extension on the Running Bridge so brilliant an assemblage of ladies and gentlemen. The ceremony was performed by Mrs. Adam, M.P.

ALLEGED MANSLAUGHTER AT COLNEY HATCH LUNATIC ASYLUM.—Police-constable Peirce Court, on Monday, William Slater, an attendant at the Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, was charged before the magistrate, "with causing the death of Thomas Austin, with the manslaughter of a lunatic named William Swift. The patient who died was under the care of the prisoner at the asylum, and he was found dead in his bed in the morning on the examination it appeared that the bruises on the body were recent. The prisoner stated that he struck the deceased in the breast and struggling he had had a fall; but in consequence of a letter to the Lunacy Commissioners, the deceased was examined by a surgeon. The charge made against the defendant a terrible inmate was called, and considerable discussion arose as to the propriety of placing as a witness in the witness-box, a servant of the asylum, and capable of giving a rational account of a transaction, but not one on which he was himself concerned. He made the following statement:—"I was in the ward on May 1 saw Swift brought in from the airing-court by Slater and Vivian; they then took him to the padded room, where they undressed him, and pushed him in. He fell on the floor, and they kicked him and grabbed him as before. He said, 'I kill me at once, don't kick me like that.'" The two witnesses came before the magistrate on Tuesday, when another keeper, William Vye, was placed at the bar beside Slater. Two other lunatic witnesses were put into the box to give evidence, but one of them became too much excited to undergo an examination. The other, however, put quite coherent. The case was again remanded.

William Ball, the centenarian of Browne's Hospital, Stamford, entered upon his 104th year on Wednesday week. His health is good, and he is tolerably active: he is an early riser, and generally walks unaided by himself as half-past six. Another inmate of this hospital has reached the honored age of 97.

LUNACY.—The report of the Select Committee on Lunatics has been published. The committee found insanity in the increase and mention the startling fact that out of every six hundred persons in England and Wales one is a lunatic. Considerable waste is going on. They recommend various amendments in the law, especially with reference to private establishments, the certificates of medical men, the treatment of pauper lunatics, and limited to three months, instead of being granted, as is now the case, for the term of a year. They also urge the necessity of provision for the protection of patients and the more efficient management of asylums.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Ministerial majority in the House of Commons on the resolution relative to the income-tax, the general opinion is that there will be an increase in the amount of business doing in national securities this week. In most instances, however, the transactions are unimportant. Generally speaking, the amount of stock in the hands of jobbers has somewhat increased.

The supply of money is in excess of the requirements of the market, and the demand for accommodation is rather active, as about previous quotations. The Governor of the Bank of England, on Thursday, fixed their rate of discount, and announced are the current rates in the open market:—Short bills, 3½ to 3¾; three months', 3¾ to 4; four months', 4 to 4¼; six months', 4¼ to 4½ per cent. It must be understood, however, that very little second-class paper is now taking up at the above rates, and that the best bills only are sought. Lombard-street is discounted with more than usual caution, owing to the almost continuance of failures in the trade of the City of London.

The inquiry for money on the Continent is still somewhat restricted. At Paris it is quoted as follows:—At Vienna, 5; Berlin, 5; Frankfort, 5; Hamburg, 4½; Hamburg, 4½; and Brussels, 3 per cent. The amount on offer to the mercantile class is very large.

The imports of bullion have been on a very moderate scale, but the whole of them have been taken for the Continent. Amongst the arrivals, we may state, have been withdrawn from the Bank of England. The steamer for the Peninsular has taken £100,000 in specie, and the steamer for the West Indies £40,000 in gold and £10,500 in silver, for Brazil. The value of the gold now on passage from America, Australia, and the West Indies is about £1,500,000 sterling.

At the next half-yearly meeting of the Ottoman Bank a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent will be declared. About £10,000 will be carried to the new account.

The transactions in the shares of the newly-formed companies have been very unimportant during the week under review. Of the Crystal Palace, Bentley and Mersey, 15-16 to 15-16 prem.; Universal Marine, 5-8 to 7-16 prem.; Lisbon and Oporto, 1-16 to 1-8 prem.; Royal Mail Steam and Screw, 1-8 to 3-16 prem.; Ditto, Preferance, 2 to 2½ prem.; South-Eastern Railway Deferred, 1-16 to 1-8 prem.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (August 8).—About an average supply of English wheat was on offer on Monday's market, and during the dearness ruled heavy, at decline in the quotations of fully 2s. per quarter. THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

GARIBALDI'S ENGLISHMAN.

ONE of Garibaldi's companions-in-arms in the campaign of Northern Italy, Captain Peard, generally known as Garibaldi's Englishman, has followed the fortunes of his chieftain in Sicily. Several of our countrymen greatly distinguished themselves on the national side at the battle of Melazzo, and among them was the Captain Peard, who, at the conclusion of the fight, was raised to the rank of Colonel for his valuable services. Colonel Peard is, we are assured by those who know him well, a fine English gentleman, and not the melodramatic hero that people who know him only through the fame of his exploits are apt to believe. He is described as being a handsome man, with long hair, beard tinged with grey, blue English eyes, and an honest English heart; much amused at the absurd stories that have been told about him—a true military man, and a worshipper of Garibaldi, intent on doing his utmost for Italian independence. We have great pleasure in introducing Colonel Peard to our numerous readers by means of the accompanying likeness of him, by T. Nast, just forwarded to us from Sicily.

COLONEL PEARD, "GARIBALDI'S ENGLISHMAN."—FROM A SKETCH BY T. NAST.

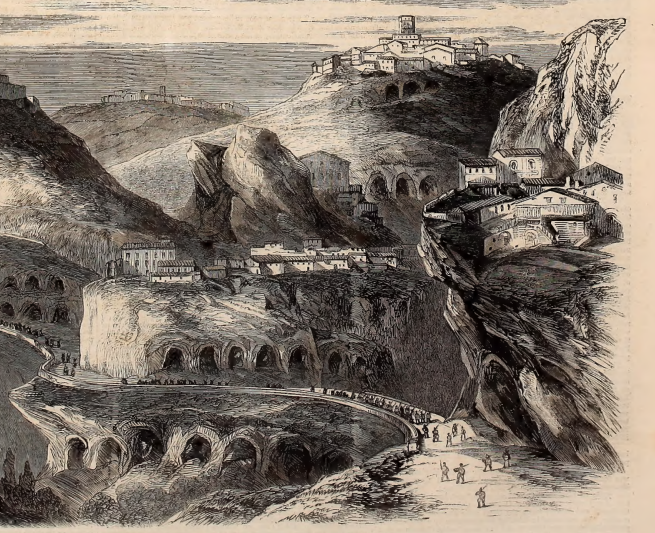
CASTROGIOVANNI, SICILY.

THIS city, the ancient Enna, is situated in the interdancy of Catania, on a tableland in the centre of the island, four thousand feet above the sea—about forty miles west of Catania and thirteen miles north-west of Caltanisetta. It is healthy and well supplied with water. Enna was celebrated in antiquity as the mythical birthplace of Ceres, and the site of her most famous temple. At five miles distance from it is the Lake of Pergusa, where, as fable has it, Proserpine was carried off by Pluto.

Our Special Artist, who, in his march with a column of the national army through the centre of Sicily, arrived at Castrogiovanni on the 10th ult., took a sketch of the town (which we here reproduce) from a ravine which divides it into three parts, and in the rocky sides of which are hollowed deep grottoes that served the Saracens in ancient times as dwelling-places.

The Times correspondent, who was attached, like our artist, to the centre column of the national army in its march from Palermo to Catania, writes from Castrogiovanni on the 10th ult. as follows:—

When you pass on the road to S. Caterina, the first great transverse spur which the mountain chain of Madonia throws out towards the south, the interior of Sicily opens out for the first time before your eyes. Until then you have been going up hill and down hill, with a limited horizon around you, and shut in between mountain slopes. You have been thus rising higher and higher, when all at once, after passing Leonfre, the scene changes—you throw your first glance into the heart of Sicily. After having given the giant Etna his due, your eye dwells on two high, isolated plateaux, which rise out of a sea of mountains before you, and on the flat top of which you discover the traces of towns. These two prominent objects, which almost eclipse the distant Etna, belonging, as it were, to a world of its own, are Castrogiovanni and Calata Scietta—Castrogiovanni, the ancient Enna, the "umbilicus Siciliæ," which played such a part in the Servile War, and in all the others which have decided the possession of Sicily at different times; and Calata Scietta, the point chosen by the Arab conquerors to reduce the invincible height opposite. Both are sufficiently remarkable to attract your notice the first moment, without knowing what they are; but it is only when you are yourself on one of those two heights—above all, where I am now—that you understand their whole importance, and the part which they have played in the history of Sicily. The plateau, which from afar seems to you a sharp narrow ridge, is spread out before you, and has a circumference of six miles, high up in the air, and surrounded almost everywhere by a steep wall of limestone rocks, in many places above a hundred feet in height. From this height the eye sees all over Sicily, and on a clear day you can see the sea from three sides—towards Catania, Termini, and Licata. Just opposite to you, on a height almost as inaccessible as that which you stand, is Calata Scietta, connected by a low saddle, which has served from all time as the chief road, so to say, and artery of communication between the eastern and western zone of the island. Whoever has possession of this can shut off one-half of the interior from the other.



There are ruins everywhere on Castrogiovanni—ruins of Romans, Saracens, Normans, Germans, and Spaniards, besides a general ruined appearance of the whole town, which two centuries ago numbered 20,000 inhabitants, while now it scarcely has 12,000 or 14,000. . . . To all those who are in search of one of the finest panoramas in the world, and to those who want, as it were, to take in Sicily at a glance, I cannot do better advice than to come here and ascend the tower of San Pino.

THE BATTLE OF MELAZZO.

WE gave last week some account of this battle—one of those rare fights, as has been justly remarked, "comprising all the grandeur of a great victory of modern times with all the exciting incidents of an heroic combat of antiquity."

The battle-ground is thus described by the Times correspondent:—

Long before you come to the coast of Melazzo you see an isolated rock, resembling somewhat that of Gibraltar, before you. On it stands the citadel of Melazzo, occupying an area of half a square mile, and falling off boldly on all sides. At the foot of it, towards the land side, lies the town, occupying about the same area, and also inclosed by substantial walls; both are connected by a narrow strip of land with the main land on the seaside of the castle; the low land continues for several miles, falling off towards the point which is crowned by the lighthouse. The whole peninsula is evidently formed by the deposits of the two little streams of Santa Lucia and Nocito, which run into the sea on both sides of it. The bend of the neck of land forms one of the most commodious natural harbours in Sicily. This and military considerations have made Melazzo a kind of centre for the roads leading from the west and the interior. There is, first, one which skirts the sea to the left of Merì; next to it comes the direct road from Merì to Melazzo, forming an angle of twenty-five degrees with it, and uniting at the entrance of the town of Melazzo. Then comes the main road to Staden, running parallel to the road on the southern towards Arola; a belt, there is the branch road which starts from the gates of Milazzo to join this latter road in the vicinity of Arola. The space inclosed by these roads forms three sides of a parallelogram, the Rivers Santa Lucia forming the fourth; the direct road from Meri to Milazzo, running due north, intersects this parallelogram, the length of which is about four and the width two-and-a-half miles. These main roads are connected by several branch roads, all having a tendency towards Milazzo. Th ingrossi was the theatre of the battle of Melazzo. The concentration of all three roads towards Milazzo gave to the Neapolitans the advantages of a concentric position, of which they were not slow in availing themselves. This advantage was considerably increased by the nature of the ground, which is covered with a most luxuriant vegetation, forming as it were one succession of gardens, thickly studded with olive and other trees, planted with vines, and in which the view is at once used for training the vines. These gardens, especially the part which contains Meri, forms a thick covert, through which it is almost impossible to make a continued movement, or see anything of the movements of the enemy. In front of Meri, about a mile from the town, on the flank, the Neapolitans had extended their line, taking all the roads within their line, and choosing, as usual, the position of defence which the nature of the ground presented to them. They divided their guns on these points, barricaded the roads, and placed their light troops in the gardens, where they were most effectually concealed.

A very animated account of the battle at Melazzo is given by the same correspondent, from which it appears that in the main the Neapolitans stood on the defensive, firing from behind walls and all kinds of covers, and were slowly dislodged, the Garibaldians losing heavily throughout. The fight lasted for fourteen hours in the heat of the day. Garibaldi's horse was shot dead under him, and he himself slightly wounded. In the following passage he describes the closing scene of the battle:—

In order to dislodge the enemy, the company of Genoese riflemen was sent into the thicket on the left to turn the enemy's position on that side. The enemy were strongly posted in a wood, and defended it with the utmost obstinacy, while all those around seemed to swarm with riflemen. There, wild with rage, the General ordered a charge at the point of the bayonet. Garibaldi and man after man fell among the small band without being able once to use his formidable weapon. A general cry arose to advance, and Garibaldi was soon in the front in a trice. By an effort the company broke through the cane, and found itself under a high wall, where it was exposed to a terrible fire of musketry. Nothing daunted, they hastened along the wall to find a gap which was at some distance. At last there seemed a chance to get at the enemy. Garibaldi, who did not wait for the bayonet, and a few well-aimed shots were the only salutes from which the General had been free. At one moment he was in the act to penetrate the position on the cross roads. Out of the company of 80, 32 remained. Below the cross roads on the left, the enemy's position was turned, and they had decided the fate of the day. This position once lost, the advance, although still opposed, proceeded rapidly. Passing the cross roads, the fire, in front of the peninsula, there is an open space of a few hundred yards, with the sea to the right and the gardens to the left. The space is covered with a few houses, which continues to the very gates of the town. Here the Neapolitans made a desperate stand, occupying the houses, and endeavouring from holes behind some large beams drawn up on the beach, and, helped by their artillery in full play by that time on the peninsula, to hold out against the advance. A column sent through the garden to the left, and the arrival of the steam-frigate Governolo, with the Genoese riflemen on board, changed their resolution. Garibaldi, who saw her approaching, hurried off to the beach, went aboard into a boat, and with the greatest coolness personally reinstated all. A few well-aimed long shots from the frigate, the first shots of the advanced guard, and the Neapolitans left, leaving the peninsula in front, broke this last resistance, and induced them to seek refuge in the castle, where two guns belched forth. The fire was returned from them, made five in all. Without even attempting to defend the town they hurried through the gates, and were they could not enter, took to the forest. Fifty guns, 130 horses, and 100,000 rounds of ammunition, are the material fruits of the victory of Melazzo; but the enemy's loss in the portion of the red results of this victory.

There was a great deal of hard fighting both on and under the bridge which leads to the neck of the peninsula, and here Captain (now Colonel) Peard, with his men, did good service. We give an illustration of the attack of the conflict from a sketch by T. Jones.

The battle of Melazzo took place on the 20th ult., and on the 25th the citadel was evacuated by the Neapolitan troops. The garrison, 3,000 men, embarked on General Bosco, who, although escorted by several officers, had to pass through a file five of bisses. The wounded were taken from the town to the beach, and the sick and the stores were packed. This gave an opportunity to all those who wished to desert. Many did so. The artillery threw into the sea the guns who took advantage of the tempting opportunity. Among the rest a sergeant's guard came over with arms and baggage. As usual, our correspondent, the Republican sergeant, was the first who set behaving as he went. They spoke eighteen of the guns they had to leave behind, besides which they left the town in so large up the powder magazine; the thing was cunningly concealed under a lot of hay and straw and of which the fuses reached all around loose powder was supposed so as to facilitate the process of explosion. It was discovered by chance, one of the soldiers having remarked the loose powder, which he thought mischievous. They were, however, under accident and carelessness getting all the credit, while the pretence was that the whole group had been planted which could not be easily removed, and which might be used to molest the departure of the brigades with the troops. The second excuse was just as untrue as the first, for eight of the guns were mounted towards the land side. The following day we give a sketch, which we engrave, of the discovery by Garibaldi's followers of the gunpowder train, and of the fact of the cannon being spiked.

THE ENGLISH BATTALION IN THE NATIONAL ARMY OF SICILY.

At the battle of Melazzo a body of troops called the English Battalion, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Dunne, did Garibaldi good service. When the Neapolitan troops were beaten off the field of battle into the town they took up the upper position, firing from the walls and doors and retreated. The English Battalion followed them close to the fortress, and got one of the first armed posts. The enemy's guns on the ramparts across the top of the narrow thoroughfare which leads immediately to the citadel, they maintained a hot fire against the Neapolitans until a stop was put to hostilities by the truce. At the end of the fight we form the subject of our illustration on the first page.

The Times correspondent, writing at one of the most critical periods of the battle of Melazzo, writes as follows of the doings of this battalion:—Although the enemy's movement was under the orders more especially of Medici, Garibaldi was, of course, the soul of the fight, finding himself invariably at the point most exposed, and exposing himself, as he was wont to do, to the hottest fire. He was still making his way slowly over and through all the obstacles, when the news arrived that the left, unable to resist the overwhelming force of the enemy, was giving way, and thus exposing the whole line to be turned on that side. Taking the only reserve remaining, a battalion composed of North Italians and Palermitans (the so-called English Battalion), under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Dunne and several other English officers, to the left to meet the attack which was made on the Neapolitans. His presence and the exertions of the officers of the battalion resulted in steadying these young troops, who not only resisted further attacks, but pushed forward with the fixed bayonet, which the enemy was sweeping the road. One advance bolder than the rest brought them to the gate in the middle of the fortification of Paste, was the first across the wall behind which one of the guns was posted, and the gunners, seeing this, fled, and the gun was captured.

The English Battalion is not composed, as might be supposed from its title, solely of English. In fact, there are not more than half a dozen Englishmen in the ranks, besides four officers who rank as one as follow:—Henry Archer, Joseph Nelson, Alexander Patterson, and Lieutenant-Colonel Archer took no part in the battle, having been left too late. Patterson was his three times, and behaved remarkably well: he has recovered from his wounds and has been made Lieutenant. The English officers of the battalion are Lieutenant-Colonel Dunne, Major Percy Windham, Captain Edward Styles, Lieutenant Robert Wilson (with Engleman), and Lieutenant Alexander Dunne.

We are enabled to give a few particulars of our three countrymen belonging to this battalion, whose Portraits appear on the first page.

Lieutenant-Colonel Dunne, Commander of the English Battalion, was formerly in the 4th Regiment of Foot, and afterwards with Beaton as an officer of Bashi-bazouks in the Crimea. He has gained the grade of Lieutenant-Colonel with Garibaldi, having left the Englishs Army with the rank of Captain. Colonel Dunne was with Garibaldi and Medici when the three were charged by Neapolitan cavalry. He succeeded in bringing down his man with his revolver (pistol-ball, whilst the General did the same for the Captain with his sword, and Missod with his revolver abruptly stopped the career of a third.

Major Percy Windham, cousin of General Windham, and son of Colonel Windham, has served five years in the French marine, and eight years in the Austrian army. He greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Melazzo, especially in the wood, at the head of a few of his regiment, a walled vineyard filled with Neapolitan riflemen.

Peter Cunningham, a young English sailor, belonging to the English Battalion, asked General Windham to pitch him over the vineyard-wall behind which the Neapolitan riflemen were intrenched. The wall was seven feet in height, and he fell amongst the enemy like a bombshell, and with nearly the same effect, for they scampered off right and left, startled at seeing the youngster come plump amongst them.

KEW GARDENS.

The director of these favourite national gardens made, a few weeks ago, his annual report to the Chief Commissioner of her Majesty's Office of Works, from which it appears that the total number of visitors during the past year was 384,698, 20,000 fewer than those in 1859.—Comparing the months of May, June, and July, which are the wet spring and autumn, and to the sultry heat of the summer. In the department of the kitchen garden, the most remarkable circumstance is in the increase of the general collection of plants, by an active correspondence and a system of exchange with almost all parts of the globe, especially of such kinds as useful and ornamental, rejecting such as have neither of these recommendations—but of the latter, specimens are preserved in the herbarium for the use of the scientific botanist. In pursuance of the instructions of the Office of Works, the flower-borders have been considerably increased, and a great number of the most showy evergreens have been added to the shrubbery, and flowering trees and shrubs. No addition to the hothouses and greenhouses has been made; but all the old ones in the existing ones have greatly improved in beauty and fineness of specimens. An alteration has been made in the arrangement of the plants and trees in the great pinetum-stove, by which the magnificent specimens of palms, the palms, &c., some of which are sixty feet high, are now planted in the ground, so that they have room to develop their full size, and with their lofty trunks, and obtains such an idea of their magnificence and beauty as has not been realised in Europe. The new arrangement has assured us, in the tropics even it would be difficult to see such an assemblage of palms as are now brought together at Kew. Great pains have been taken during the past year to increase the botanic grounds or Arboretum. Besides continued planting, the formation of new walks, and the laying out of the ground, additions have been made two features in anticipation which will add greatly to the beauty and attractions of these grounds. One is the new lake, five acres in extent, now nearly completed, which is to be fed by the Thames. It is to take with its beautifully wooded island, is situated midway between the Kew-house and the Pagoda, and will be seen from both. It will be supplied with water from the Thames by a pipe or drain at high water. The other is the erection of what has long been the great desideratum of the gardens—a museum of botany and vegetable products, a museum commensurate with the extent and importance of this great national establishment. The museum will be divided into two parts, one of which contain extra-tropical countries, especially our own colonies. A grant has been sanctioned by the Treasury for this purpose during the next Session, and a very beautiful and efficient plan prepared by Mr. Decimus Burton, the designer of the Palm-house. As the contents of this museum will be of the same general character as the museum which constitute the Arboretum, it is intended to erect it within the pleasure-grounds, near the Palm-house, and to connect it with the latter and to the fine Deodar Vista and avenue of hawthorns or May flowers, now coming into bloom, leading to the Pagoda. Popular and more frequented, it has been determined to open the gardens for a period of free admission to the public, which was little more than four of the summer months, to the public. In the present year, from the 1st of May to the last day of October. The director justly alludes, with great gratification and pride, to the educational and scientific departments of the establishment. In 1859 Professor Lindley and Mr. Moore, on the objects of the most varied and valuable description, systematically arranged, and with the assistance of Mr. Bentham, the whole of the genera in the collection of works more or less connected with botany and manufactures generally.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

GENERAL THE HON. HENRY MURRAY, K.C.B.

General the Hon. Sir Henry Murray, K.C.B., who died on the 29th ult., at his house at Wimbledon, was the youngest son of David, second Earl of Mansfield by his wife Louisa, daughter of Lord Henry Murray, younger son of Mansfield in her own right, and was grandnephew of the able and eloquent Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench of Mansfield. Sir Henry's father was uncle of William David, present Earl of Mansfield. Sir Henry Murray was born on the 20th of December, 1784, and was, when a child, very notice follows this, among the few remaining Waterloo officers. He had been trained the Royal Military College, and received his first commission in 1803. In 1806 and 1807 he served in Naples, Sicily, and Calabria, and for accompanied the Expedition to Egypt, and was made Captain. He served in the attack on Alexandria, the siege and storming of Rosetta, and on every other occasion in which troops were in hazardous service. He was one of the Walcheren expedition in 1809, and was at the siege and surrender of Flushing. In 1810 he was at the Lisbon-Cadiz expedition, and was present at the 18th Hussars, to the Peninsula, and was present at the crossing of the Adour; he commanded the Light Brigade of Guards in the affair with the action of Morales de Toro. Murray again commanded his regiment in the battle of Vittoria, and in 1814, the Pyrenees and the battle of Orthez, and the Cavalry, under the command of Major-General Sir Hussey Vivian. Murray headed the Light Brigade of Guards in the retreat from Burgos to Alba de Quatre Bras; and at Waterloo he was in that brilliant charge of his brigade which commanded the Household Brigade of Cavalry. At Waterloo Murray was made a C.B., and on the 19th of May of this year he was advanced to be a K.C.B. He became a Lieutenant-General in 1841, and died on the 6th of February, 1853. He was on the 19th of March, 1853, appointed Colonel of the 14th (the Duke of Wellington's) Regiment of Foot. He was also a Commissioner of both the Royal Military College and of the Royal Military Asylum, and for a long time was Governor and Commander of the Western district. Sir Henry married, on the 28th of June, 1819, Emily, daughter of General Sir Henry Bayly, Bart., and sister to the late Admiral Bayly, and by the youngest son, Captain Arthur Stormont Murray, of the Rifle Brigade, died in August, 1848, from wounds received in the attack on Sebastopol.

GENERAL SIR H. WYNDHAM, K.C.B.

General Sir Henry Wyndham was the second of the sons and adopted heirs of George Cumberland Wyndham, Esq., of Dinton, Wilts, a title now extinct. He was the brother of George Wyndham, present Lord Leconfield, and was born the 11th of May, 1788. He entered the Army in 1804, and had served high military honour in the Peninsula and at Waterloo. He shared in the battles of Vimiera, Corunna, Talavera, Busaco, Fuentes d'Onor, Salamanca, Vittoria, and Waterloo. He was appointed in 1841 one of the police magistrates of the metropolis, and sat first at Worship-street, and during the last year at Marylebone. Mr. Hammill generally good sense, tact, and humour in the execution of his office, and was esteemed both in public and private as a worthy and amiable man. His remains were taken, with every mark of respect, to Sussex Gardens, on the 30th ult., to very generally and deeply regretted. Mr. Hammill married, in 1824, Jane, daughter of the late Thomas Hammill, Esq., of Liverpool, Esq., of Liverpool, merchant, and niece of the late well-known barrister and politician, the late eminent Liverpool magistrate, Edward Rushton, Esq., by which lady he leaves a family.

THE VICTORIA CROSS.—The Queen has been graciously pleased to signify her intention to confer the decoration of the Victoria Cross on Captain John Augustus Wood, of the 30th Bombay Native Infantry, and on Lieutenant and Adjutant Arthur Thomas Bigge, and Lieut. Hale Thomas Malcolmson, of the 3rd Bombay Light Cavalry, in consideration of their gallantry and good conduct displayed during the late campaign of the Malwa force in Persia in 1856-57; also, on William Odgers, leading seaman of her Majesty's ship Pearl, in consideration of an act of bravery which he performed in the recent operations against rebel natives in New Zealand; also, on Private Samuel Bailey, 2nd battalion Military Train, on account of bravery in India.

While storms, rain, and fogs continue to obscure the sky in the north of France, certain other parts of the country are favoured by the most delightful weather. A letter from the department of the Ain announces that the summer there has been superb, and in the Haute-Saône not a drop of rain has fallen for six weeks. Accounts from that part of France announce an exceptional abundance of forage, corn, vegetables, and fruit.

The Bordeaux Journal says that the Municipal Chamber of Commerce to present to Paris, for the purpose of protecting the manufactures of that town, have received from the Minister of the Interior a report in which he expresses sympathetic testimony to the good faith of the French Government, and expresses their conviction that the treaty will be highly beneficial to both countries.

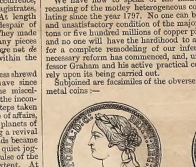
THE NEW BRONZE COINAGE.

A REFORM of so important a nature as that involved in the recasting of the inferior currency of the British empire calls for some preliminary statement of the circumstances which have led to it. With as much brevity as is consistent with clearness of explanation we shall endeavour, therefore, while furnishing faithful copies of the new coinage now in process of striking at the Mint, to trace the history of our copper coinage from the year 1787 to the present time. We commence our inquiries from this particular date because it happens to mark an epoch in the annals of the English coinage. Prior to the year 1787 the copper currency of the kingdom was in a most unsatisfactory condition. It had done duty for a long period, and the baneful consequences of hard usage and old age had left it worn, defaced, and deteriorated in the most extraordinary degree. In addition, too, to the dilapidation resulting from the wear and tear of customary circulation, the legitimate coinage of the realm was subject to the disadvantage of a similarity with the spurious specimens of counterfeit mintage. It is almost needless to say that the public suffered in no small degree from the loss of money of the denomination we are considering. Indeed, it is a well-known fact, determined and signified on the Royal Mint being at that time within the Tower of London.

The laborious and humbler classes of the community—far less shrewd and intelligent than, thanks to the printing-press, they have since become—were quite incapable of distinguishing between the genuine and the counterfeit, to the great discomfort, inconvenience, and loss of the good money from the bad, and the inconvenience, instead of being diminished, was augmented by the issue of tokens, which, from their possessing no intrinsic worth, with no satisfactory state of affairs, by the mechanical inventions of James Watt and other great planters of the scientific benefactor, Matthew Aikwright, were coining a very profitable business, and the demands for coin of all kinds became proportionately extended. The Mint, which, from the year 1775 to 1797, had coined but half a million of copper pieces, had the impulse of the change, and its resources were soon taxed to their utmost extent. At length the time came at last, and the copper mountain was moved, but not before the public had suffered to the extent of nearly 2,000,000*l.* sterling. The operation, however, was conducted with so much energy and promptitude, and the new coinage was so much superior, both in point of workmanship and durability, to the old, that the change was received with general satisfaction, and was completed in the short space of two years. The effect of all these private contributions to the natural channels of monetary circulation was that they were flooded. The Mint was almost entirely superseded, and it was found anything was to be met with but curious and interminable varieties of the legalised tokens. Besides the facilities which the publication of these tokens afforded to those who chose to make it answer the purpose of address cards or advertisements, it held out a premium of considerable magnitude. It was coined at a low price, and those who determined to make money did so in a double sense. A ton weight of copper was actually coined into 2240 pieces of money, and the cost of the metal, it is clear that the owner could not be charged more than 2*l.* 10*s.* between the year 1787 and the present value of the 103,040 pieces of money, or something over 4*l.* 4*s.* per ton.

In the year 1797 the inconvenience arising from the anomalous condition of the copper currency reached one more a culminating point. Complaints poured in thick and fast, and from every quarter to the same point. Complaints of the most general character. At this period, the Royal Mint being fully occupied in stamping gold and silver moneys, it became an absolute necessity to look for numerous aid to meet the public requirements. Hitherto the coinage of the kingdom, with the exception of the token currency, had been jealously confined to the use of the Mint. The money-factory, however, by an innovation on the practice was unavoidable. The extension of the Mint, confined as it was to a single corner of the City, which corner could be spared, was impossible. The military authorities of the fortress, was simply an impossibility. After some discussion in the Council of Commerce, Matthew Boulton was employed, therefore, to summon to their assistance the resources of private enterprise.

Mr. Boulton, of Soho, near Birmingham, quickly responded to the appeal. He had already an extensive plant of machinery provided for his own purposes, and the application was made to him accordingly. The first contract taken by this gentleman for coining the national pence, halfpence, and farthings was for 500 tons of copper, and the cost of the pence, halfpence, and farthings were pressed into existence. The pieces were very heavy, and the broad band or protecting edge surrounding each caused them to be disliked by the public like "cart-wheels." The term was intended that the "cart-wheel" pence should serve a double purpose—that of measures of weight as well as of money. It was thought that the public would have a check against their nefarious practices. by denominating their pence "cart-wheels," the public would have a check against their own pennies. Upon the same principle Mr. Boulton undertook and executed a coinage of halfpence and farthings of pence two ounces each. About three-quarters of a million of these unwieldy specimens of mintage were issued, but they were not popular. The pennies, on the contrary, were liked, and other contracts were soon taken by the proprietors of the Soho manufactory for their coinage. The practical inconvenience arising from the weight of these pieces, however, soon became apparent. Manufacturers sometimes found the cost of copper slabs and tiles per cwt. to be as much as equal to the nominal value of the same weight of the newly-minted pennies that it was actually to their advantage to collect and melt them down for conversion by other purposes. Many cases of penny rapidly disappeared in this way, and the folly of making intrinsic and nominal value go together in the formation of copper coinage became obvious.



After the year 1799, up to which period the Soho Mint had poured into the channels of circulation forty tons of twopennies and twelve hundred tons of pence, the pound weight of copper was coined into 18 pence, 36 halfpence, and 72 farthings respectively, and this arrangement continued until 1805, when Messrs. Boulton and Watt again undertook extensive contracts for the supply of copper money. Another alteration in the division of the pound weight now took place, and it was again in the direction of reduced weight in the coins. Twenty-four pence were now deemed the proper number to be yielded by each pound of copper, and of halfpence and farthings 48 and 96 respectively. For Ireland, however, a distinctive coinage, of still less intrinsic value, was appointed. In this, known as the harp money, the figure of the device of the reverse, the number of pieces to the pound troy the device of the reverse, the number of pieces to the pound weight were—of pence 26, of halfpence 52, and of farthings 104.

Under the English copper coinage, beginning in 1805 and ending in 1808, Messrs. Boulton and Watt produced—of pence, 361 tons; of halfpence, 693 tons; and of farthings, 224 tons. Of the Irish copper coinage, commencing in 1805 and terminating in 1806, the same firm supplied 151 tons of pence, 467 tons of halfpence, and 71 tons of farthings; making a grand total of copper coins furnished by the presses of contractors between 1797 and 1808 of something over 2,000 tons, or upwards of 5,000,000 individual pieces of money.

This enormous quantity of the inferior currency struck and issued in so comparatively brief a space of time directed the public attention and the Legislature, consequently of the energy of his Majesty's counsellors. It did not, however, suffice for the wants of the community. Its issue was confined to the higher portion of the industrial and manufacturing classes, and the thousand new branches of trade springing up through the agency of steam rendered the necessity for yet more money. The local trade trade languished, though it did not expire until about 1813, and all things tended to show the indispensability of creating a similar issue of copper money on a more extended scale than that in the Tower. Accordingly, in 1808 it was determined to erect a Mint worthy of the country; and in 1810, at a cost of £250,000, the establishment was erected and constructed; and from that time to this the whole of the gold, silver, and copper coins, with two or three trivial exceptions, have been coined at the Royal Mint.

We have now to speak of the immediate subject before us—the meaning of the many heterogeneous coins which have been accumulating since the year 1797. No one can be ignorant of the deteriorated and unsatisfactory condition of the majority of the copper coinage. Tons or five hundred millions of copper pieces at present in circulation; and no one will have the hardihood to assert that it is not high time that a new coinage extended to the whole of our lieges. This great and necessary reform was commenced, and, under the able auspices of Prescott Hewett, has been happily practised coadjutors, we may confidently rely upon its being carried out.

Subjoined are facsimiles of the obverse and reverse of the new mixed metal coins:—

THE NEW BRONZE PENNY (ACTUAL SIZE).

The metal of which they will be composed is a species of bronze, containing—

Copper	...	95 parts
Tin	...	4 ditto
Zinc	...	1 part

The number of pence to the pound will be 48, of halfpence 80, and of farthings 160; this being the first instance in which the relative proportions of coins as regards weight have not been equal.

The new coins, by reason of this division of the pound of metal, will weigh—

Penny	...	145·83 grains.
Halfpenny	...	87·50
Farthing	...	43·75

While their respective diameters will be—

Penny	...	1·200 inches.
Halfpenny	...	1·000
Farthing	...	·800

The weights of the last coinage of copper of Queen Victoria were—

Penny	...	291·66 grains.
Halfpenny	...	145·83
Farthing	...	72·91

And the diameter—

Penny	...	1·33 inches.
Halfpenny	...	1·05
Farthing	...	·86

The economy of metal in the new as compared with the old coinage is very marked; and, as regards the durability, from the use of a common alloy, the new coinage of 1860 will be found immeasurably superior to the copper.

As regards the artistic character of the new money the pre-eminence is hardly a less striking. The portrait of the Queen is admirable, and is happily the reverse of the robe, with its cross, thistle, and shamrock, is the dispersing of the robe, with its cross, thistle, and shamrock, is not less pleasing, but that a palpably a necessity, occasioned by the large proportion of ornament allotted to the bust of her Majesty. Turning to the reverse, we have the time-honoured emblem Britannia* regarding with apparent interest a noble ship—the ever-popular emblem of sovereignty for an insular coin—is seen a phares, or lighthouse. The legend is merely the value of the coin, and on the halfpenny the date, 1860.

The Engravings of both Obverse and Reverse are in very low relief, an advantage, perhaps, in a coin so distinguishing material, and which this engraver, assisted by the tenuity and hardness of the metal.

* The popular tradition that the personification of Britannia was originated by Charles II. is erroneous. On the Roman Imperial coinage of Antoninus Pius, struck in A.D. 140, we find a female figure, seated, and accompanied by waves, in her right hand a standard, in her left a javelin, her elbow reclining on a shield, the leading device for her order; in the exergue, "Britannia." The figure is supposed to typify the subjugated province, and well illustrates the line in Horace, "Britannos hospitibus feros." Under the reign of Charles II. the figure, that is Charles II.'s reign, after an interval of 1690 years, the Britannia of the Roman empire appeared on the coinage of England. Philip Rondel to have been the engraver, and to have introduced the likeness of Miss Stewart, afterwards Duchess of Richmond, in the figure of Britannia.

MONEY ORDERS.—On the 15th instant, and thenceforward, remittees of money orders will be furnished gratuitously at all money-order offices with a printed notice, containing a few words of explanation for money orders. The public are recommended, when applying for money orders, to write the name, address, and description of the payee in a plain and clearer security than verbal directions against mistakes.

THE LATE DUKE OF CUMBERLAND.—The Duke of Cumberland has retained several despatches from the naval and military officers commanding the forces of Nicholas I. in the Crimea, and has entrusted a black mahogany cabinet, with his native pals at Taranaki. The conduct of that officer, of his First Lieutenant, and of the men under his command, has been highly praised by the Commander-in-Chief. The Admiralty have promoted the Lieutenant to the rank of Commander.

NEW YORK INSTITUTIONS.—"The New York Directory," just issued, enumerates among its public institutions 29 Lunatic Asylums, of which 8 belong to the city, and 21 to private bodies. The city alone has a less than last year, with a total capital of 76,766,925 dollars; 18 Savings Banks, with 1,000,000 depositors; 11 Commercial Banks, with a capital of 13,000,000 dollars; 2 Insurance, 3 Congregational, 22 Dutch Reformed, 3 Friends', 1 Jewish, 15 Episcopal, 7 Lutheran, 31 Methodist Episcopal, 9 African Methodist Episcopal, 1 Methodist Protestant, 1 New Jerusalem, 45 Presbyterian, 4 United Presbyterian, 1 Associate Reformed dito, 5 Reformed Presbyterian, 24 Protestant Episcopal, 93 Roman Catholics, 2 Unitarians, 4 Universalist, 4 Wesleyan Methodists, and 20 miscellaneous; 4 City Railroads, 16 Clubs, 9 Dispensaries, 22 Public Schools, 34 Primary Schools, 8 Coloured Schools, 8 Colleges and Seminaries, 21 Ferries, 29 Foreign Consuls, 11 Harbourmasters, 13 Hospitals, 145 Insurance Companies, being 4 less than last year, having a total capital of 64,245,000 dollars; 20 Life Insurance Companies, 19 Marine Insurance Companies, 15 Public Libraries, 87 Magazines, 166 Manufacturing Companies, 14 Mechanics' Institutes and Societies, 24 Religious and Benevolent Associations and Companies, 76 Weekly and Daily Newspapers, 62 Mercantile Companies, 181 Societies, and 29 Stage Lines and Routes.

LITERATURE AND ART.

IT is just fifteen years since England, artistic, bureaucratic, and journalistic, was convulsed by the momentous question which demanded "Shall Cromwell have a statue?" Oddly enough, the vexed query has again cropped up in the course of a quiet conversation on the estimates in the House of Commons. The authorities who for so many years have had the decorations of our Legislative Palace in hand were desirous of giving a series of commissions to sculptors for statues of all the Kings and Queens of England, from Egbert and Canute to the last George and the last William. These statues were only to cost £800 apiece—not much for statues even in the aggregate, when the enormous amount we have cast to the winds in connection with poor Sir Charles Barry's building are taken into consideration. In one of its periodical fits of economy, however, the House has put a stop to the proposed grant, and therefore, the gloom of which was to have been relieved by double files of British Sovereigns, is, for the present at least, to remain desolate as the walls of Balclutha. The "statue" placed on these historic walls will be more regarded as the amount of patronage doled out to English sculptors is at most times miserable, and the fifty kings and queens, at £800 each, would have been an appreciable boon to many an unemployed Praxiteles of Phidias, and many a struggling Phidias of Fitzroy-square. The Government did not even propose to have all the statues executed at once, but would have been content to order them at the rate of a brace a year, and going backwards; that is to say, with George IV. as Alpha and Egbert as Omega.

But what has all this to do with Oliver Cromwell? Much much. If the statue question was originally confined by the parsimonious Commons we should have had a renewal of the old 1845 controversy regarding Noll's right to rank as a Sovereign Prince between Charles I. and Charles II.; and, as it was, a very pretty little discussion did arise in the House touching his patriotism or his tyranny, his sincerity or his hypocrisy. It was urged against Oliver that, in defiance of the standing orders, he had once forced himself into St. Stephen's, bidden one of the Members to "fetch the bauble that hangeth over the mace—turned the members out of the House, locked the doors, and put the keys in his pocket. Many other things did this stern Protector accomplish, and misdemeanors are the degrees of ascendancy which he has been held by his countrymen and by posterity. Andrew Marvell apostrophised him in an ode as one

> Into another mould.

Clarendon summed him up as a "bold, bad man." To Napoleon he was almost a demigod, and to Mr. Carlyle he is something more. We have his pictorial presentment in the National Portrait Gallery, there is certainly room in the South Kensington accumulations of the Fine Arts Commissioners should not be at last attended to, and Oliver Cromwell's statue placed between those of such "eminent Englishmen" as Falkland and Hampden.

The Archæological Association began their pleasant labours on Monday at the Townhall, Shrewsbury; but in the most unpleasant weather. The Association, which has been in existence eleven years, has been almost as peculiar a potoir as the Basque of the Pyrenean provinces of France), and the recent excavations at Wroxeter, the ancient Uriconium, were among the principal themes of discussion on the first day of meeting. A most interesting paper from Mr. J. H. Pinxlee concerning the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle was read in the morning. While our associated sages of archæology are thus gregariously philosophising at Shrewsbury, we find that a most unpleasant feud is in progress at Norwich—has been visiting Norfolk for the purpose of taking "rubbings" of the monumental brasses in some of the churches. Dr. Rimbault, the well-known musician, the son of the democratic Prince of Canino, and the accomplished linguist who has translated Mr. Layard's "Nineveh" into Italian, are also in Norwich, and Mr. Boileau Pamplin and Mr. Dunn the world goes round. One Bonaparte collects autographs, another Bonaparte has a mania for "dead flies." While is busy in his imperial cabinet writing to his "dear Sandys," while another Bonaparte is trying to cut cartridge paper and beefsteak on a brass plate in a Norfolk chancel.

That Book, so much talked of, written—yes, and published and sold—his Memoirs, and that the said Memoirs are most voluminous, and that they contain not a little of the inner history of Napoleon, have been tinged with all the talent and all the originality, but the world in scientific and in matters of public notoriety. But the world in general, and the Spanish peninsula in particular, are not, it would seem, content with the autobiography of the author of "Monte Christo;" and some good-natured scribe in a clerico-absolutist paper called the Esperanza, published at Madrid, has undertaken to write a "New Life and Adventures of Alexandre Dumas." The work will, if completed, certainly be an addition to the "Amenities" of literature; but it has already given rise to a "Literary Victoria Peres." Her Majesty the Queen has even, we are informed, been graciously pleased to signify her approval of the work. Whether Mr. Tennyson Punshon will envy her success, and may be permitted to indulge in a sincere hope that the Queen and her laureate-consorts may not be induced to follow Dumas and her lady-companions may not be induced to follow Dumas and her lady-companions may not be induced to follow Dumas and her lady-companions

HAIGHMOND CLIFF AND CASTLE.

On Monday the members of this association opened their seventeenth annual congress at Shrewsbury, under the presidency of Mr. Botfield, M.P.; the vice-presidents making up a long list of members of the House of Peers, right honourables, honourables, members of Parliament, and fellows of learned societies. The proceedings occupied the week, the congress opening on Monday afternoon with the inaugural address of the president. This was followed by the first dinner of the members, and there was an evening meeting for the reading of papers, and discussions. The programme of the week included excursions to Lindlow Castle, Stokesay Castle, Tong Castle, Bradwas Abbey, Wenlock Priory, Boscobel, the Royal Oak, Lilleshall Abbey, Shifnal Church, Roman lead-mines at Snailve, Roman villa at Linley, Haughmond Abbey, Battlefield, and the interesting excavations on the site of the Uriconium at Wroxeter. This last—so throbs the most interesting excursion of the week—was reserved for the last day. Among the papers read was one by Mr. Planché on "The Earls of Shrewsbury," two by Mr. Pettigrew, and two or three on the discoveries at Wroxeter, one having for its special subject the peculiarities of the skulls discovered there.

Among the famous old towns of England few could have been better selected for the purpose of antiquarian inquiry than the well-known capital of "Fair Salopia." The town abounds in matters of interest, and still retains many of its primitive features. The castle, rather ruinous and disfigured, contrasts curiously with the adjoining railway station; old inns and quaint-looking timbered houses here and there meet the view; and many of the streets of the "Gay Metropolis" have been left much what Shakspeare may have attended on the spot with the players.

The house and shops shown in the Engraving have a particular interest, for even the shops have been little changed, and from their appearance we may gather some idea of the appearance of the best of the London shops three or four centuries ago.

In the churches are many matters well worthy of observation, and in Shrewsbury are found fine examples of ancient stained glass brought from abroad, and placed in dismantled windows. The Church of St. Chad, although managed in an unpromising manner as regards architecture, and near this are the remains of the Abbey and some of the monastic buildings. The stone pulpit, which we engrave, is almost the only portion remaining which enables us to form an idea of this once important place.

Besides the history of antiquity the modern institutions of Shrewsbury are worthy of praise, and the people of this town have reason to feel pride in it; and to be loud in their cry for places, grounds and the poorer classes, a stranger will meet with so much attention and intelligence. Pleasantly the Severn passes along here; and on the clear and sparkling river may be seen, in these days of steam-packets and locomotives, the simple coracles of the fishermen, unchanged in form or in the manner of navigation since the days of the Ancient Britons.

Surrounding Shrewsbury the country abounds with buildings of picturesque beauty, which have many historical associations. Of these, Battlefield is the famous site, Uriconium, where so many important excavations and discoveries have been made, some of which have already been illustrated in these pages. Many of the churches present remarkable features, and in some the Bible and other books of the church service may be seen chained to the ancient reading-desks.

From nearly every point the Wrekin forms a bold object. There are also peaps as the Welsh mountains, which from here are seen in blue and misty grandeur.

At about three miles and a half from Shrewsbury, on the road to the Welsh borders, is Battlefield, the battle-field of Shrewsbury, where Sir John Falstaff fought three hours by Shrewsbury clock, if he might be believed. The particulars of the struggle which took place on this spot are well known, but by the historical records and by Shakespeare's play, that it is not necessary here to refer to them. It is, however, worth while to visit the appearance of the ancient spot, and in the broken foreground are rushes, weeds, and pools of water, and indistinctly may be seen mounds and ridges which had been used as defences during the battle. The whole field seems to be covered with other mounds of various heights which were reared over the bodies of the slain.

In the middle distance is Battlefield Church, which was built soon after the battle, as it might be offered as a prayer for the souls of those who fell in this fierce struggle. This building is a fine example of the architecture of the period, and it is to be regretted that it has been allowed to fall into decay. The nave of the tower and other parts is rent, and the roof of the nave has entirely fallen in. This church was for many years the chief of the English historical monuments, should be allowed to fall into decay. The east end of the building is in a state of preservation, and is very well kept, and in one part is a vocal carving of a female figure supporting the dead Christ; another, over the gable, is a niche which contains the effigy of the renowned warrior whose spur have became cold.

So quiet seems the spot, which still over a large space is desolate and untouched by the plough, that it is difficult to picture to ourselves all the terrible struggle which here in old times took place. Not far off are fields of corn, one of which can be distinguished, until the birds warble, but we listen in vain for the chimes from the Shrewsbury clock-tower, which is seen over groups of trees in the distance. We, therefore, may listen, doubt it, the truth of the story that during the chimes above the ringing of the battle, even supposing that there was a clock in existence in the time of the battle, a circumstance not likely. Notwithstanding this matter of doubt, when on this spot there seems much evidence that the great conflict must have taken place. Haughmond Cliff, where, tradition says, the body of Robspur was found after the battle, answers well the description of the "Rocky Hill" over which the sun was so gloomingly on the morning of the important event. There are other features of this locality which show that Shakspeare, in order to have written the scenes in the play, must have carefully noted the spot.

At a short distance from Little-field is an oak of great size and age. From this spot the fight might be seen, and the combatants from this point Glendower, the Welsh chieftain, seeing the contest turn against his party, sent a message to assist, "with all his power," to his native hills.

Over Haughmond Rocky-hill lie the ruins of the Abbey of that name, and there are no more picturesque spots to be met with. Some of the Norman details are very beautiful, and the decayed stonework has an incrustation of the appearance of being set in rye bread, and the most deep foliage. A few of the flat incised monumental stones and other relics of the past are left.

Amongst the most popular of the antiquities in this district are White Ladies; and close by are Boscobel and the Royal Oak, intimately connected with the early and adventurous years of the unfortunate Charles II. Unfortunately the original oak, in the branches of which the fugitive king found refuge, has entirely passed away from existence. The present oak, grown from an acorn of the Royal Oak, is now on or close to the spot.

In several parts, more particularly towards the Welsh border, are tumuli of great antiquity, which are evidences of the occupation of the neighbourhood by the Britons and the Romans. Offa's Dyke, the most extensive Roman remains at Uriconium (Wroxeter) may be mentioned the Roman villa at Linley and the Roman lead-mines at Shelve. There are other important traces of this great people.

Bridgwas Abbey, with its massive tower backed by wild hills, must not be passed without notice, and the quaint old-fashioned Shifnal Church, Stokesay Castle, Wenlock Priory, Lilleshall Abbey, More, Wroxeter, Atcham, and very curious churches.

A pleasant week is spent in viewing the remains of times gone by. The student of antiquity gains increased knowledge, and many who have a taste for what was and are put up during the chief part of the year engaged in professional and other business, besides the enjoyment of the sight of so many places of note, and the meeting with friends to whom their peculiarities and history are well known, have the advantage of fresh research and the sight of many carriages and other dwellings almost buried in roses and flowers, and other English scenes which are most agreeable to the eye.

It is another advantage of meetings of this description that attention is directed to important and valuable relics, which is often the means of their restoration and preservation, and we trust that one of the pleasant results of the Shrewsbury meeting will be to make an endeavour to preserve the Church of Battlefield from further decay. The parish is of small population, and could not meet the expense. This is, however, one of the landmarks of the past, a memorial associated with both history and literature which it would be a pity, if not something worse, for this enlightened age to see perish. Attempts have been made before, and with a certain result, for the purpose of preserving this interesting object; but, somehow or other, this matter seems to have been passed over. We hope, however, that the meeting of the Archæological Association may be the means of directing the public-spirited gentry of Shropshire to the subject.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A HINT TO PROVINCIAL CHESSMASTERS.—Her Kling, the famous problem composer, we are told, is at present engaged in the construction of twelve problems, one for each of the twelve signs of the zodiac, to be given to the Emperor of Russia on the 12th of August, as a new year's present. He has already, we are told, visited Manchester, Birmingham, Coventry, and Northampton; and in every place has met a cordial—and, we hope too, a profitable—reception. In addition to his claims as a problem-master of the very highest rank, Mr. Kling is a player of ability, and fully capable of giving instruction in the openings and middle game to those who require it.

T. ATKINS.—The games, both matches and odds, between the Clubs of Cardiff and Bristol have terminated in the victory of Cardiff—winning both games. We have not yet had time to examine the games, but will report on them shortly.

A LOOKER-ON.—1. The committee of the Cambridge meeting are no doubt aware of and will provide against the difficulty you point out. 2. We have not the slightest interest in the competition. If the gentlemen undertake to enter, the result will depend upon the energy and liberality of British amateurs, and not upon the opinion of a single player, however influential. 3. Various unsigned letters on the same subject should forward their subscriptions to E. Worsley, Esq., M.A., Sydney-terrace, Cambridge.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

On the evening of Monday, the 6th of August, the regular frequenters of the House of Commons must have felt something as the personages are supposed to feel in those dramas which run through two or three acts in a dream, and at the end of which the chief characters find themselves exactly in the same place, and surrounded by the same circumstances, as when they fell asleep, all the intervening action and change having faded like a phantasmagoria. The dull cold evening, the early sitting, and consequently early illumination of the House, the rapid filling of all the seats, and the regular ranging of the two parties on each side, created the illusion at once whether it was not February, and that he was not about to witness one of the early talking-matches of the Session. The "whips" have been necessary to get up a gathering of members on both sides: indeed, it was said that one gentleman was brought from Scotland, another from Ireland, and the leaders of the row in Syria could not go on without an Englishman or two of distinction looking on and seeking a seat. No doubt the little debate in the early morning of Tuesday, which lasted for six hours, bringing over 500 members together in the second week in August. At the last moment there were whispers that a good deal of excellent management on the part of the opponents of the Government had been thrown away; and that, notwithstanding the comparative failure of the meeting of Liberals at Lord Palmerston's house, the leaders of the Government were safe by a majority of forty. Mr. Gladstone came in next very early, looking pale but composed, and there was no frown on his brow nor any contraction of his lips. He looked calmly about, and more as after a brief conversation with Mr. Brand, the chief "whipper-in," to which he replied that functionary as soon as he took his seat. The aspect of the House at the moment that he rose to make his statement was striking. Every place was full; the ranks were crowded, from the right to the left. Even this it was curious to one must the household troops of France and England have guzzled on each other during that famous repast at Fontenoy which has become a mark in the romance of history. Not a cheer greeted the Minister for the decision of whose political fate that assembly had gathered, as in plain and simple language he opened his speech with an explanation of some technicalities connected with the motion in hand, and for the appearance before him of the well-known deputation which always accompanies great departmental statements, and beside which Inland Revenue and Customs's mendacious mixture which his bronchial affection renders necessary, no one could have augured from the early part of Mr. Gladstone's speech that he was standing at bay upon the question of his political existence. Indeed, all through there was a moderation of tone and demeanour, and suppression of excitement, which was remarkable and, perhaps, on the whole it was the most tactical speech Mr. Gladstone has ever made. There was rather more than his usual quiet humour into it here and there, and the humour itself was less grim than ordinary. Probably any one who heard him then for the first time would have been disgusted and wondered at the cry which was raised on whom he had heard so much and so recently? Nevertheless, there was no want of rhetorical advice at the conclusion; and when the well and long

ANCIENT HOUSES IN THE TEMPLE, AND THE GRAVE OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

On the 4th of April last the grave, within the burial-ground of the Temple Church, has been closed upon the earthly remains of the kindly-hearted, clever, but improvident Goldsmith for a period of eighty-six years. A place associated with such a man, with Dr. Johnson, and others, important links in the chain of English literature and art, would have great interest, if even unconnected with other matters; but within those precincts is one of the most choice relics of antiquity of which the dwellers in the metropolis can now boast.

From Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, this property passed into the hands of the Knights Templars of Jerusalem, by whom the Middle Temple was leased to students.

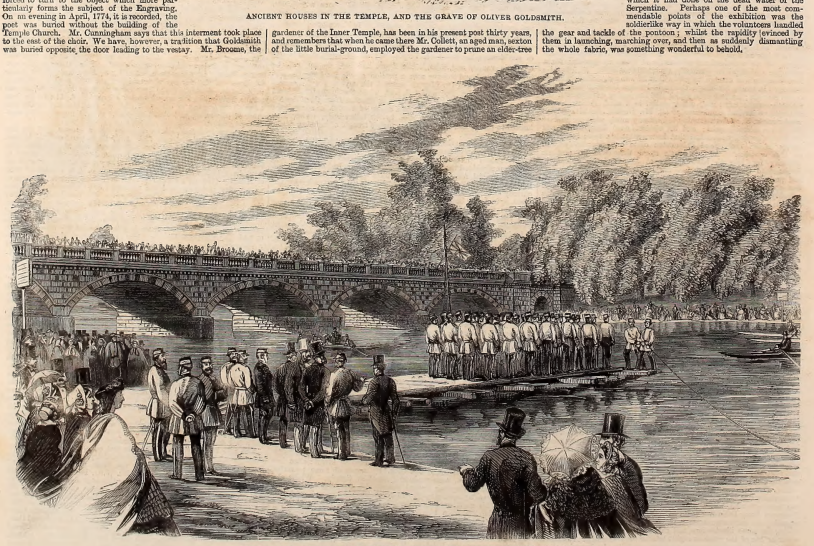
The Outer Temple was disposed to Walter Stapleton, Bishop of Exeter, and Lord Treasurer, who was beheaded by the citizens of London in 1326. From that time the students of the two Inns of Court remained tenants of the Crown till 1608, when James I., by letters patent, conferred the two Temples on the Benchers of the two societies and their successors for ever. It is just worth while to glance at these particulars for the purpose of getting at something like the date of the ancient houses which form the background to our Engraving of Oliver Goldsmith's grave.

At the Great Fire of London, in 1666, a considerable portion of the precincts of the Temple was destroyed, or so much injured that it was necessary to reface some and entirely rebuild others. The houses in New-court, built of that substantial dark-coloured brickwork which was so extensively used after the fire, bear the date 1677.

In Brick-court—in No. 2, on the first floor of which Goldsmith for some time lived—the houses have been rebuilt. Letters from Goldsmith are dated from this court in 1771. In 1767 other letters were sent from the Temple (Garden-court), and others from the Temple Exchange Coffee-rooms and adjoining taverns. Mr. Timbs, in his "Curiosities of London," says—"Oliver Goldsmith lived in Brick-court, No. 2, second floor, over the chamber of Blackstone, then finishing vol. 4 of his 'Commentaries.'"

After comparing the dates of the various groups of buildings which are here—the Norman Church, the old Hall, the houses shown in the Engraving, and other relics of times gone by—it will be found that great changes have been made since Dr. Johnson and Goldsmith may have wandered here. Such coats as the "bloom"-coloured one made by John Filby, at the Harrow in Water-lane, for Goldsmith, are not now to be seen within the Temple, and the "crop wig" of Dr. Johnson, and the more ornamental one of Goldsmith, would now be curiosities; so would the dark and dreary oil-lamps, which, before the introduction of gas-lighting, made the darkness of night visible. Literary and other gentlemen coming from their clubs are not now familiar with the heads of traitors above the gateway of Temple Bar. In 1745 these ghastly exhibitions were not uncommon.

There might be many thoughts recorded by the literary associations of the Temple at about the date mentioned; but, much as we feel disposed to gossip about them, we are now forced to turn to the object which more particularly forms the subject of the Engraving. On an evening in April, 1774, it is recorded, the poet was buried without the building of the Temple Church. Mr. Cunningham says that this interment took place to the east of the choir. We have, however, a tradition that Goldsmith was buried opposite the door leading to the vestry. Mr. Broome, the gardener of the Inner Temple, has been in his present post thirty years, and remembers that when he came there Mr. Collett, an aged man, sexton of the little burial-ground, employed the gardener to prune an elder-tree of considerable size. The old man, who seems to have been of penurious habits, incurred this expense annually because he said that the tree covered the grave of Oliver Goldsmith. The stone is to the south-east of the spot which has been pointed out; but it might be well to know upon what authority it has been thus placed. On one side of this memorial is inscribed "Here lies Oliver Goldsmith;" on the other, "Born March 10, 1729. Died 4th April, 1774." Mr. Broome, taking into consideration the growth of the elder-tree referred to, considers that it was in being at the time of Goldsmith's death. Be this, however, as it may, the authorities of the Temple, or whoever placed this memorial-stone to one of our best writers, are deserving of praise. Many come here, particularly visitors from America and foreign places, to look for this grave; and we feel glad that, even if a little mistake may have been made regarding the spot, there has at length been shown a disposition to prevent the neglect which has been before referred to in this Journal.



Many will hope that the example of the "Templars" may be imitated in connection with the burial-places of Daniel de Foe and John Bunyan—whose works of "Robinson Crusoe" and "The Pilgrim's Progress" may be worthily classed with "The Vicar of Wakefield" and "The Deserted Village."

ANCIENT HOUSES IN THE TEMPLE, AND THE GRAVE OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

PONTOONING BEFORE THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

During the last three days of the past week the 1st Middlesex Volunteer Engineers were experimentalising on the Serpentine with a new pontoon, the invention of Captain Fowke, R.E.; and on Saturday last the Commander-in-Chief attended, as also did General Sir J. Burgoyne, R.E., the Commanding Royal Engineer (Major Keene), Colonel Gordon, Captain Donnelly, R.E., and numerous other officers. His Royal Highness arrived on the ground at four o'clock, when operations were at once commenced, the Volunteer Engineers being under the command of Captain Macleod of Macleod, and the detachment of Royal Engineers present being in charge of Lieutenant Mildem. The pontoon to be tested consists of an oblong framework of wood and iron, over which when fixed for use is drawn a surface of prepared canvas—each pontoon being portioned into eight compartments, all water-tight, so that while one of these divisions remains perfect the boat can never sink. When thus canvassed over it has the appearance of a large ship's boat, and can be at once launched. On its upper surface rafts are now fitted, and on those again are run the chasses or boards. Each pontoon being now complete, it will float with eighty men on its top, and then it only draws sixteen inches of water; while the time requisite to build a bridge of six pontoons is ten minutes, and to again dismantle the same five minutes. To each float of six pontoons is apportioned an extra one to serve as a boat in which is accommodation for twelve oarsmen. After the proceedings were over the Commander-in-Chief expressed himself much pleased with the success of the invention. His Royal Highness stated that he would cause another trial to be made at Chatham, in order that it might be seen whether in a stream the bridge would show the same satisfactory result which it had done on the dead water of the Serpentine. Perhaps one of the most commendable points of the exhibition was the soldierlike way in which the volunteers handled the gear and tackle of the pontoon; whilst the rapidity evinced by them in launching, marching over, and then as suddenly dismantling the whole fabric, was something wonderful to behold.

INDIAN FINANCE—FUTURE POLICY.

If the House of Commons is to be taken as the representative of popular feeling in reference to the affairs of our Indian empire, it would be possible to say that no subject excites so little interest in the English mind. From a variety of causes it is the most difficult thing in the world to get what is technically called a House to listen to a practical Indian debate, such as is involved in the annual financial statement. This year the circumstances which indispose our legislators to the duty, expanded into the task, of listening to the Secretary of State for India for a number of hours, more or less indefinite, were rather multiplied than diminished. It chances that the class of members who take part in these discussions, whether official or amateur, do not possess any of those personal qualities in reference to a debate which are calculated to attract a sympathising if not a comparatively unintelligent audience—unintelligent, of course, in the sense of not being acquainted with the subject and capable of adding information or suggestions to the matter in hand. But, although there was, perhaps, the most meagre assemblage of listeners to the delivery of an Indian budget which has ever yet been exhibited in the House of Commons, there has seldom been a more remarkable or a more suggestive exposition of policy and intention than that which was brought forward on the present occasion.

If the Secretary of State for India laid down any principles at all, they were, that there should be a resolute stand made against loans for bolstering up the differences existing between revenue and expenditure, and that the permanent debt of India should be confined to the amount of a hundred millions, at which it will stand during the present year. In the next place, the fiscal arrangements which are in process of completion are calculated to bring about the desirable consummation of making expenditure and income correspond for the future; and Sir Charles Wood has gone so far as to venture to fix a date for the accomplishment of that happy object, and that by no means a distant one. So much this object involves the imposition of new taxes on the whole population, European and native, of our Indian provinces. As regards the details of the plan which Mr. Wilson, under the sanction of the local and home Governments, has proposed for effectuating this purpose it is difficult to give an opinion or to predicate what may be its results. Great authorities differ as to the advisability of adopting a uniform system of taxation for the whole of India, and doubts are expressed whether some attempt ought not to have been made to adapt the machinery of taxation to the peculiar habits, customs, and genius of the natives of the different provinces. An impost which would be received, as a matter of course, in Bengal might rouse popular indignation and disgust in Madras; and some such opinion, and its promulgation in a very unadvised and indiscreet manner, led to the recall of Sir Charles Trevelyan from the government of the latter presidency. Even in the United Kingdom our financiers hesitated before they inflicted the income tax in a Procrustean form on the whole nation, Ireland having for some time been exempted from the imposition of that burden. How much greater must be the danger of upsetting such a tribute broadcast over the various races of India, whose peculiar prejudices and usages are not merely principles, but sentiments interwoven with their whole social and religious existence?

However that may be, the attempt is to be made with the view of carrying out the intention of making both ends meet. Auxiliary to this operation, we learn that efforts will be made to reduce expenditure, and to promote economy in every department of the Administration of India. At present the great incubus is the cost of the enormous military establishment, the reduction of which is not to be in a state of siege; the reply was given and the national guards being exhorted to do all in their power to maintain public order. From this statement it is said the Ministers at first objected—was caused, doubtless, by an attack made on Monday night by Garibaldi's army on the fortress of Capua. The Neapolitan frigate pursued the aggressor. On Tuesday Court Aquila, the heart and soul of the reaction at Naples, rose to the height of folly. Dispatches announced the capture of the fortress of Scylla by the Neapolitans; but this news must be received with great reserve.

All the accounts from Naples agree that Garibaldi is continuing with the greatest activity his preparations for disembarking in Calabria. Considerable forces have been collected at Reggio, at the entrance of the Strait of Messina, and almost all the peninsula has been converted into a vast intrenched camp. Several Neapolitan line-of-battle ships have been stationed in front of Reggio, from which command the channel in the narrowest part—that is, a little in the rear of the Sicilian batteries—and the Neapolitan and Sardinian vessels to pass without exposing themselves to total loss, or at least to grave injuries. The General has at last succeeded in organising his artillery, which is the weakest part of his army. He now possesses several batteries of compagnies pieces, mountain howitzers, and sixteen-pounders, all drawn by mules. Cavalry is wanting, and the improvised men could have been hoped from soldiers most of whom, only a few days back, knew nothing of the management of a sword. All this seems to have been carefully selected. It is believed that the Neapolitan army in Calabria consists of about 40,000 men; and it is said that General Ghio has concluded himself at Scylla. The object of the Dictator can place about 20,000 men in line; and yet, three months ago, it consisted only of a handful of volunteers.

SARDINIA.

The official Gazette of Turin publishes an account of the subscriptions to the new loan, according to which the total amount subscribed is 120,124,200 francs.

A circular addressed by the Minister of the Interior to the governors of the provinces has been published at Turin. That circular is designed to repress illegal interference in the affairs of the State, and to prevent the undertaking of hostile steps against neighbouring Governments, in order to avoid all pretext for intervention. The Opinione officially announces the formation of a corps of volunteers to join the National Guards.

Letters from Turin state, under reserve, that, in order to avoid the grave complications which might result from the Sardinian occupation of the Neapolitan States by Garibaldi, there was a question of sending a Sardinian corps d'armée to Naples, in virtue of a convention between the Governments of Turin and Piedmont.

AUSTRIA.

The railway from Salzburg to Munich, which connects Bavaria with the Austrian States, was opened with great ceremony on the 15th inst. At the dinner which took place on the occasion an unusual treat was afforded to those who participated in the festivities of seeing Monarchs unbending and mingling in the most unconstrained manner.

The following is the text of the Emperor of Austria's speech :—

The calamity of the last campaign was a painful one for every monarch, because between him and that are widely separated by position. May they employ the new means of communication which have connected all parts of Germany, to extend the blessings of prosperity! Then you must all feel, with me, that this festival claims a higher character. Whether by the Danube, Germany and Austria, they are brought nearer to each other. The sons of Austria rejoice to give the hand to their brothers of Bavaria, and to bind them in peace by the ties of love and fidelity. And the same feeling of unity with which we have attended you to the frontier, we extend to all the other German princes and neighbours, greeting them in this assembly I cannot but remember with pleasure the day on which, a few years ago, I had the honour to receive the Prince Regent of Prussia, strengthening those opinions we mutually entertain. I am assured that he, too, will bring to your view his sentiments. Hope and enthusiasm fanned the flame of the Royal Friend and Brother of Bavaria! Bavaria's Brave and Faithful People! Long live Germany! Long live and People of Germany!"

The King of Bavaria, in reply, said :—

In the name of my people, and in my own, I thank you, with the warmest sincerity, for the kind words you have given. Germany, the consciousness of which we celebrate, has a widely extended importance; it will bring kindred races nearer together. May God's blessing rest upon it! Hope and enthusiasm recently hailed the friendly meeting of the Sovereigns of Austria and Prussia; it is a guarantee for the unity of Germany, and in that unity lies our strength and power. From the bottom of my heart, therefore, I give you the toast, "My Imperial Brother and Friend of Austria! Austria and her brave Emperor! Long live the two great Powers of Germany!"

It is no longer a secret that the Conference at Teplitz with regard to the foreign policy of the two German Powers. Austria will not interfere with what takes place in the remainder of Italy; and Prussia and the remainder of Germany will not interfere with Austria if she be attacked in Venice, provided, however, the attack proceeds from the Italians exclusively. Only in case France or any other Power foreign to Italy makes itself war with the Italian question, and sends troops to Italy, the self-imposed obligation of Germany would cease. The Patrie of Tuesday, however, says :—"We have reason to believe that, in the event of Garibaldi's threatening the provinces of the kingdom of Naples, or organising an expedition against the Austrian possessions, Austria would not wait for the attack, but would proceed to meet the Garibaldian troops on whatever point of the main land it might be necessary."

The special constitutional committee of the Austrian Council of the Empire have, in a private sitting, by 18 against 5 votes, decided for a federal form of government, and separate constitutions for each single province, as proposed by the Hungarian members. This wish is to be placed before the Government in the most simple form, and in such a way that the reply must be either affirmative or negative.

The Austrian military authorities at Mantua continue to seize proclamations exciting the people to disorder, which are daily posted up, and even thrown about the streets.

The news from Hungary received at Vienna continues to cause disquietude. Among other things, it is stated that General Benedek, in whom the Court party had placed great hopes, finds the task of tranquillising the population almost impracticable, and has resigned, and has consequently expressed a wish to retire from his post of Governor. General de Meluzo is spoken of as his successor. The Protestant Assembly of Miskolcz, on terminating its proceedings a few days ago, had a grand banquet given to it, which M. Zsedenyi proposed a toast to the Chief of the State, and, in doing so, expressed the hopes that before the end of the year the Prince Primate would place on his head, in presence of the assembled Diet, the crown of St. Stephen.

In virtue of the protocol signed at Paris on the 3rd inst. Austria is about to augment her naval force in the Syrian waters by three ships of war. During the last few days extraordinary activity has been shown in the Austrian marine; all vessels fit for service, including the Novara, are being armed.

RUSSIA.

The Emperor of Russia, by Imperial rescript addressed to the Senate, has just sanctioned an association which has been formed, under the protection of the Empress, with the name of "Society for the Re-establishment of Schools for Peasants' Children in the Russian Empire." The rescript states that formerly the Christian faith predominated in the Caucasus, and that, being set aside by Islamism, the most conspicuous traces of it can yet be found there. The society in question, consequently, proposes to re-establish that faith by "persuasion and the preaching of the Gospel."

TURKEY.

A conspiracy has been discovered in Bayuldéré, near Constantinople. The conspirators had formed the project of plundering the Embassies. Numerous arrests have taken place, and guns have been seized.

The Porte has given an answer to the Servian deputation. In reply to the first demand of the deputation—viz., the recognition of the hereditary succession in the Obrenovitch family—the Porte refuses to acknowledge the abstract right, but consents to the succession of Prince Michael. On the second point, referring to the residents of Turks in Servia, the Porte declares that of the Constantinople Porte consents to be bound by the capitulations forbidding such residence. Regarding the third point, the Porte will not, for the present, consent to frame a new Constitution—the Porte refuses to accede, but will send commissioners to inquire into the desires of the new Constitution.

A local loan of 3,000,000 piasters is being negotiated by the Porte.

SYRIA.

News from Syria has been received up to the 29th ult. Fuad Pasha had arrested the chief of the Druse insurrectionary party, Yussuf Bey, and Kurchid Pachas have arrived at Constantinople under arrest. Ahmet Pacha has been sent from Beyrout, after having refused his dismissal. Kurchid Pacha is to follow. Both are to be tried by mixed commissions. There are rumours of a massacre at Bashbe. All is quiet at Aleppo.

UNITED STATES.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Times says:—"Rumour asserts that there is a well-organised movement in several of the Southern States for the dissolution of the Union on the 4oth inst., and that a convention will be called to assemble at Boston which course England and France will pursue in the event of the establishment of a Republic of Southern States is supposed. Delegates may be invited to sources in the interest of the Douglas wing of the Democracy, whose interests may be furthered by the spread of such reports."

The New York Times has a long article on the material interests of the country, says that the recovery from the financial depression arising from the failure of the Ohio Insurance Company has been rapid in some parts of the land. A general good harvest was reserved for the present season. The yield of wheat is large, there has been too much rain for cotton, and the drought and excessive heat have been damaging to the crops of corn and potatoes. Should the drought make further inroads on the crops of cotton and potatoes, it is said that there will be much below the increased planting, and we think we may safely anticipate a crop equal to the last, the figures of which will reach the extraordinary total of 4,600,000 bales.

Mr. Dimitry, the United States' Minister, has succeeded in negotiating a Convention for the purpose of arranging the Mexican Treaty claims against Costa Rica. The Convention will sit in Washington.

THE GREAT EASTERN.

The exhibition of the Great Eastern at New York was brought to a close on the 28th ult. The total number of persons who had visited the ship since her arrival was 143,809. She left on the 30th, at 4.30 p.m., on her Canadian excursion. She had passengers on board, all of whom had paid ten dollars each. She arrived at seven o'clock on the morning of the 31st, and after a deal of grumbling succeeded in having coaled, owing to bad management. Water was scarce and provisions insufficient. It was officially reported that the great ship will require for coaling the 14th, 15th, and 16th inst., and will be ready for her departure for England on the 16th inst.

The New York Herald makes a rough calculation of the financial result of the vessel's trip to New York :—"Let us see now how the profit and loss account of the voyage stands. She will leave Southampton on the 16th inst., and she will leave this country for England on the 16th of August, which, allowing ten days for her return trip, gives her a month for the whole voyage—four twenty days. Her expenses average about 1200 dollars per day, or probably not quite so much, at which rate the expenses of the voyage will be 36,000 dollars, or we will say, in round numbers, 80,000 dols. She will have received before the voyage is completed, about the following sums from various sources:—From 100,000 visitors, at 1 dol. each, 75,000 dols.; from her trip to Cape May, including tickets and profits on the restaurant, 10,000 dols.; from her trip to Canada, 15,000 dols. more; from her visit to Annapolis, 15,000 dols. in coal; from visitors at Annapolis, Baltimore, Detroit, Norfolk, &c., on her trip home to England will probably pay 15,000 dols.; and her passengers and other sources about 10,000 dols.; making her total receipts 150,000 dols. Thus she will have made a clear profit of 70,000 dols. by her first Atlantic voyage."

As a prelude, it is said, to the total abolition of passports in France, the Emperor ordered that foreigners visiting Paris to witness the festivities of the 15th of August—the Emperor's fête—should not be required to show passports.

THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH FLEETS.—A chiefly pamphlet has just been published, from the pen of Mr. Bentley, the object of which is a comparison of the naval and military forces of England and France. The preface states that the figures originally written by order of the Government, and not for publication; but that, in consequence of misstatements on this side of the Channel, it has been thought advisable to give it publicity. The following is the statement it makes of the strength of the French and English navies. The strength of the English fleet, says the author, is taken from the "Navy List" of the 1st of July, 1860. The effective strength of the French fleet on the 1st of August, 1860, is given. Only the ships afloat are put down; those on the stocks are not mentioned :—

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) :—

NAPLES AND SICILY.—PARIS, August 13.—This morning the Constitution attempted, but without success, to capture a Neapolitan steamer. The Palmerstone fired upon the Castiglia.

Last night the Veloce disembarked one battalion of Garibaldian volunteers in Calabria. The Neapolitans kept up a brisk fire for half an hour.

Sicilia's artillery has not yet left Sicily.

A Calabrian has been arrested here. He has confessed having received money from Count d'Aquila to assassinate Garibaldi.

AUSTRIA.—VIENNA, Thursday.—The Archduke Maximilian has left for Pola in order to dispatch another frigate to Naples, where the disembarkation of Garibaldi is considered imminent.

MONTENEGRO.—Cattaro, Thursday.—The assassin of Prince Danilo, who has been arrested here, is an exile. He denies having committed the crime. The body of the deceased Prince has not been found. At Cettigne, accompanied by his widow. The nephew of the Prince, who has been educated at Paris, has been proclaimed his successor.

CHINA.

We have received advices from Hong-Kong of June 23, and Shanghai June 24. The latter is from the manager of the North-China Herald and Mail, published at Hong-Kong :—

"Lord Elgin and Baron Gros, with their respective suites, arrived here on the 21st. We believe the Envoys will proceed to the north immediately, the state of matters at Shanghai rendering their presence there unbecoming.

"Admiral Hope left for Shanghai on the 9th instant, where he arrived on the 16th. Sir Hope Grant was left on the 11th for the south. All the troops have also left, principally during the early part of the forenight. From Cowan we learn that the troops there had proceeded to the residency at Tsiawtsiawan, about 40 miles from Canton.

"It is extremely doubtful if the complicated state of affairs at Shanghai, coupled with the pressing demands for troops, will allow the Court of Pekin to try and prevent hostilities. The Emperor would thus have a huge force at his disposal to send against the rebels.

"The rebels are also carrying everything before them. Soochow has fallen into their hands, after an immense loss of life and valuable property. The Governor and several other officials had been killed. It is doubtful whether the rebels or the Imperialists soldiery (when it is said, have not had pay for some time, and have taken to pillaging) are they ought to be the worst. The disaffection of the Imperial troops had, no doubt, a considerable influence in effecting the overthrow of Soochow.

"The Governor-General Ho Kwei-Teing had taken refuge in Shanghai. He was said to have got into communication with the Allied Ministers at that port, and had entrusted them to send a force to retake Soochow for the Imperial Government, promising, at the same time, that the rebels should be kept out of the city by the troops who were properly not entertained. He also paid a visit to the American Minister, it is supposed, for the same object.

"Soochow is one of the largest, most populous, and richest cities in the empire, and the loss must be a serious one to the Government. According to William's 'Middle Kingdom,' it contains nearly two million inhabitants. It is surrounded by a wall nearly ten miles in circumference, and of which only about one-half is built upon and to measure ten miles. It is through this city that most of our imports passed, which will now in all probability come from an overland route.

"At Shanghai the utmost consternation prevailed. Trade was at a complete stand-still. All the natives that could leave were leaving, and many rich Chinese had chartered foreign boats to take their wives to other parts of the coast, or to store goods, treasure, and valuables.

"In fact, the rebels would be at the gates of the city by the time a force of what part of the expeditionary force remained here. Hong-Kong is in fortress, defended by a government of Europeans. They will incorporate any draughts of men from home, and detach draughts to the north, as may be necessary. Its strength at present is 863 men. The artillerists, under Captain Rowlson, and holding the forts for the troops; and Mr. Goddard, of the consular service, has been stationed there to keep a surveillance over the Chinese settlers.

The Grand Duchess Anne of Russia, sister of King Leopold, died on Wednesday morning at Altenau, near Bonn.

Prince Edward Montenegro was shot on Sunday at Cattaro by a Montenegrin refugee named Radic, and died on the following day of his wounds.

The Polynesian, a journal published at Honolulu, announces that the young Prince of Hawaii has been officially proclaimed heir to the throne. The Legislature had decided that the Queen on marriage with the House of Assembly shall receive 100 dollars per session, that 100 dollars a year shall be the annual salary of each representative of each session, and that the House of Nobles shall not exceed twenty, and that the franchise shall be the right of every native twenty years of age.

The "GRAND CUSTOM" IN WEST AFRICA.—The following extract is from a letter dated off Judy 11th of June, addressed to the King of Dahomey, is about to make the "grand customs" in honour of the late King Gezo, and has written to the Governor Minucci, the Portuguese agent for the ceremonies to be performed on this occasion. Badahung has made the most extensive preparations for the celebration of the grand custom. The great pit has been dug which is to contain human blood enough to float a canoe. Two thousand victims are to be sacrificed on the occasion.

A PROFANATION.—A tourist just arrived from the Grand Chartreuse states that on the 26th ult. were the monks were horribly scandalised by the fact that a young country to all agriculture, accompanied by a guide to the monastery, and passed the night therein. The fair intruder, an inhabitant of Grenoble, is described as a most elegant and pretty young lady of gentlemen. In the morning she recorded the triumph of her curiosity by carving her name and address on the door of the cell in which she slept. The Duchess de Berri was the heroine of a similar adventure some years ago.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.—The annual public meeting of the five academies of the Institute of France took place on Wednesday, in the Grand Hall of the Sorbonne, in their honour, by the Academy of moral and fashionable authority. M. Gilbert, President of the Academy of the Beaux Arts, presided, and the meeting was supported by MM. Rouher, Baroche, de Vieyra, Chasles, Halevy, and Franck, delegates of the five academies. After an eulogium upon the deceased, M. Walewski, as President of the Academy of Heavy IV. of France; M. Hitforff, a notice of the late Sir Charles Barry, the English architect; M. Ingres, of Jean Goujon; M. Guizot, a biographical notice of Cicero with Cesar; M. Viennet, five new tables in verse; and M. Claude Bernard, a memoir on the nature of the nerves and their functions in motion and hunting; and on the possibility of making them assist in medicine. The proceedings then terminated.

THE SOLAR ECLIPSE.—Perhaps the most singular paper per' sented at the last sitting of the French Academy of Science was one from M. Bianchi, who stated that the total eclipse of the sun on the 18th July last was in Spain, and who announced the astounding fact that the same protuberances, &c., were observed by himself and by M. Rico, at the same time, the one occupying the same place, and having the same form; and he confirms this statement by the assertion that the observations of the one and the other, by the numerous astronomers that he saw Bialy-Bradi, which were also seen by the English observers at Reyes, at which M. Bianchi had been present, and which he had described in the Spanish journals during seven days. On the latter subject, M. Leopiatti, who has also sent in a memoir, declares that he saw the same protuberances at Torino, Milan, and Padua, in equally perfect form. Bialy's Beads were not seen until by him. His chief object in sending in his memoir was to communicate to the Academy the peculiarity of this phenomenon of luminous appearance, and to describe certain luminous streaks not presenting the same form as the rest of the coronary phenomenon. M. Leverrier's report on the subject was to the effect that the observations were interesting, and that the phenomena described were to be seen with the telescope. He mentions four principal protuberances, and one of Leverrier's red cloud. In addition to these papers, a communication on the same subject was read by M. Prazmowski, who also had selected Reyes for his station; his purpose being to make experiments of polarisation on the light of the corona and protuberances. The results he has arrived at are that the light of the corona, having been polarised, is still very light, and is derived from the sun; but that the protuberances do not emit polarised light of the same kind, so far as he can judge from the light of the moonlit at the same time after the angular position, whether these solar effects can be compared to that of the light of the moon, or to that of the temperature of the sun at all events leading to the supposition that they must be composed of very refractory substances.—Galignani.

The Bishop of London has instituted the Rev. J. Cohen, M.A., Minister of the Jews' Free Synagogue, Great Alie-street, to the living of Mary Whitechapel. The chaplaincy to Holloway, which thus becomes vacant, is in the gift of the Court of Aldermen.

On Thursday week the Bishop of London preached a sermon on the occasion of the opening of a new church in Clapton-street, for the religious instruction of a neglected population inhabiting that neighbourhood.

The Chancellorship of York Cathedral, vacant by the death of the Rev. Lewson Vernon Harcourt, M.A., has been conferred upon the Rev. W. C. C. Vernon Harcourt, M.A., Rector of Bishopthorpe, who recently been collated by the Archbishop of York to the vicarage of Doncaster.

A series of meetings in commemoration of the tricentenary of the Scottish Reformation commenced on Sunday in the Church Assembly Hall, Edinburgh. The proceedings were opened with a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Cumming, of the Scottish National Church, London, who, among the speakers.

Lord Houghton has conferred the canonry in Westminster Abbey, rendered vacant by the death of the Rev. Edward Repton, M.A., upon the Rev. Evan Daniel, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, Incumbent of Grosvenor Chapel, South Audley-street, and Rector of Bergavenny, with Llanfihangel Ystern Llewern, Monmouth.

The Bishop of Ripon objects to professional singing in churches. He has just addressed a letter of remonstrance to an incumbent in that diocese, who has introduced a choir and has thus a permanent singer had been engaged to sing on the reopening of his church. He exculpates the clergyman from any intentional disregard of the authority exercised by the Bishop.

YORK MINSTER.—The Very Rev. the Dean of York has presented to the Chapter the munificent donation of £2,000, to be invested as an ornamental fund, in the name of Archbishop Musgrave, for the repair of the cathedral. This great liberality is in keeping with his former donations so well known as the gift of £1,000 to the Minster Fund, and £500 for the improved approach to the cathedral.

PRESENTATIONS.—The Rev. DAVID LAING.—On Monday the mortal remains of the Rev. David Laing, the late Minister of St. Giles's, in the City, were interred in the Grayfriars churchyard, after a procession over the course of persons. From Trinity Church to the cemetery some hundreds of persons followed in the train of the deceased, and in addition to every mark of respect paid to the memory of the reverend gentleman. The procession of five carriages contained the relatives of the deceased, and a large number of private carriages, and the inhabitants, with the schools, walked in procession. The whole proceeded to Grayfriars' Burying-ground, where the body was laid in the founder. Mr. Laing graduated at Cambridge in 1824. He was some time Librarian of Edinburgh University, and afterwards Librarian to the Faculty of Divinity Church, where he continued till 1857, when the Bishop of London appointed him to the living of St. Giles's, which he held till his death.

INAUGURATION OF THE ELLESMERE MEMORIAL.—The tower recently erected on the Bridgewater Canal was inaugurated on Thursday yesterday week. The erection has been raised by public subscription, and has been erected by Mr. Thomas Worthington, of Manchester, from the designs of Messrs. Weeks Wood, and is Gothic in design. The base of the monument is square, and is surmounted by a circular tower. On the base are four figures, which appear the family arms. Mr. Webber, of London, is the architect, and under his superintendence the building was erected. The Rev. Canon Parkinson presented the key of the tower to the noble Lord (who, with the Countess and family, was present), and his Lordship returned thanks.

NEW GAME ACT.—On Wednesday the new Game Act was printed. Town and after the passing of the Act on Monday last the new duties have been in force. The following is a list of the duties under the Act, which came into force at the same time as the Act of April and before the 1st of November, and after the 1st of April and before the 1st of November, and after the 1st of October and before the same year in which it is taken out, £2. Or, if the certificate be taken out after the 1st of November, to expire on the 6th of April following, £1. For a gamekeeper, if he kill game on lands of a person having that right, £2. For every license to kill game on lands of a person having that right, £2. For every license to deal in game to be granted by the Commissioners. In default of a license to deal in game, £5. To also the 11 and 12 Vict., c. 29 and 30, except that a "game certificate" is to be substituted for a "gun license." By 25 Geo. IV., c. 50, sec. 3, no person is to kill game, but a gamekeeper or servant, to be responsible for the killing of game in any part of the United Kingdom.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

Lord Elcho, in a letter to the Times, discusses the question as to the formation of certain corps, recommending that, in preference to distinct regiments of working men, they should join existing regiments, being enabled to do so by means of cheap uniforms. All classes would then join his Lordship, in conclusion, he is able to mix in the same ranks, and a brotherhood in arms would be formed which no power would dare to disturb, and which would set all dangers, whether from without or within.

The 1st Albany Volunteer Rifle Corps passed holding a rural fête on Monday next, in a meadow commanding a view of St. Albans's Abbey, and the ruins of the ancient city of Verulam, kindly lent by Lord Grimston.

Imitative of the volunteers in the north and south of her Majesty's dominions, the Caledonian and Dundalk had a review of their own on Saturday last, at Newton-le-Willows, a force of 1000 strong being accumulated on the ground. The men mustered in great force, considering the fact. In the centre of the ground the volunteers were drawn up in four brigades. The second, third, and fourth brigades were somewhat weakened, owing to the circumstance that a train of 400 yards in the rear of this line was the remainder of the first brigade, and the men of the latter were waiting for their other brigades, the whole completing the centre. The cavalry, 200 strong, occupied a position on the right flank of the line. All the movements of the troops were effected on one side, and the usual regularity which astonished the public, and drew forth praise from soldiers of the line, was not wanting on this occasion. The battalion marched towards the troops, and complimented them very much upon the military knowledge they had displayed.

The 1st Lanarkshire Rifle Volunteers were inspected last Saturday afternoon by Colonel M'Murdo in Bushey Park. The volunteers travelled by South Eastern Railway carriages, and arrived in the park about four o'clock. They consisted of 398 rank and file, including the officers, formed into eight companies, and were put through a variety of military evolutions. The men were addressed by Colonel M'Murdo, who complimented Earl Cowper on their commander, and on the efficiency of the corps, and expressed a hope that they would not discontinue the drills, which professed the most happy results.

A shooting-match took place yesterday week at Longford Park, when the Ipswich Volunteers competed for a prize-cup. The cup was afforded by a number of Ipswich gentlemen, and is valued at 50 guns. The distance was five shots at 400 yards range, five at 500, five at 600, and five at 900. The competition lasted four hours, and the highest number of points was obtained by Mr. Pretty, jun., who made 42 out of 25.

Last Saturday the 1st Division of the 1st East Rifle Volunteers assembled at the Militia Barracks, Maidstone, under the command of Major Scott, and, after marching through the town, the men, to the east of the Town Hall were, in the presence of a large company, they were presented with a pair of colours by Mrs. Scott, the wife of the commanding officer.

The North Staffordshire rifles were inspected on Tuesday in Trentham Park by Colonel Wilbraham, C.B., the inspecting officer, assisted by Captain Thompson, the Adjutant. Each company was accompanied by its band. At the close of the inspection the officers of the battalion entertained the corps, and should have the pleasing task of forwarding to the Lord Lieutenant of the county a request for their services.

A ball was given by the officers of the Rifles, on Wednesday, at the Wimbledon Assembly Rooms, which was splendidly attended. The room looked very pretty, and the Duchess being out at this point by the officers. Her Grace, with a few observations, presented the colours, and after a moment to the corps, handing to the senior Captain, who addressed some suitable acknowledgments to her Grace and the ladies present, and the ceremony was accompanied. Its reception was announced by a general salute, and the band struck up the National Anthem.

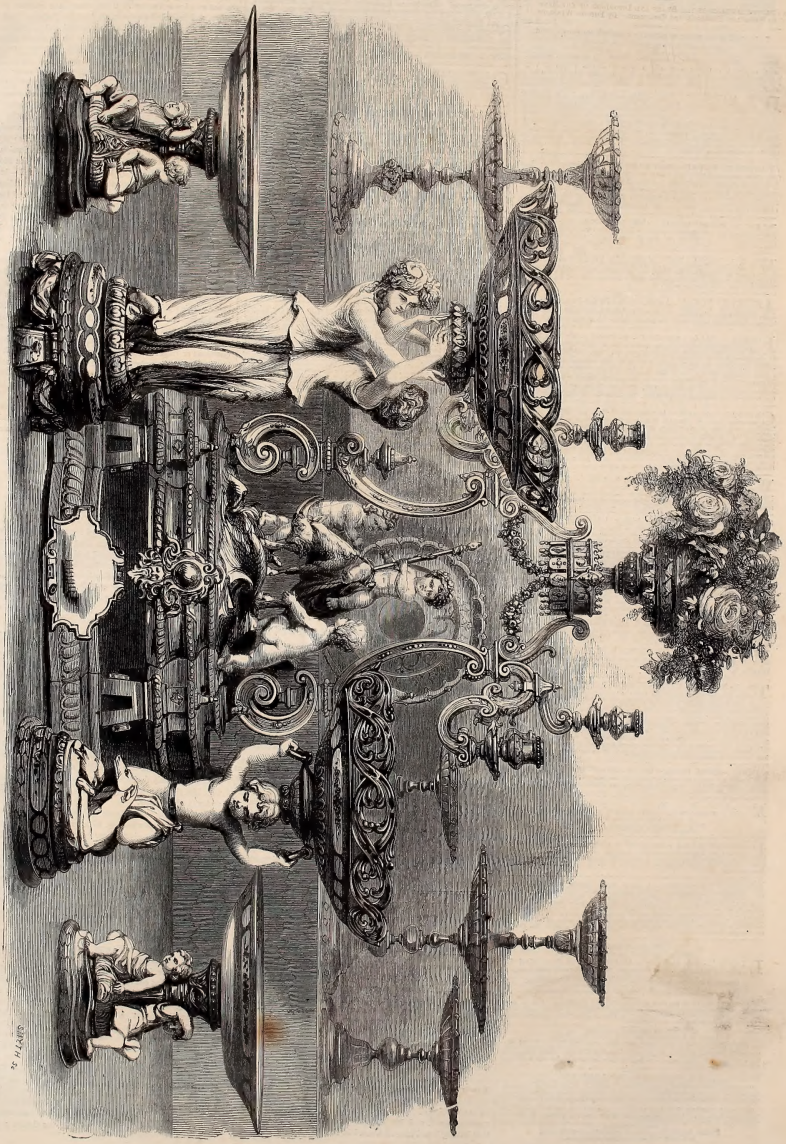
While the Artillery Volunteer Corps were camped in gun galleries at Adelaide Lines, Hythe, on Tuesday, and the guns were being fired, a premature discharge occurred, by which Mr. Harris, a member of Captain Wellington's company, had his right hand blown off, and received injuries to his fingers in all directions. Mr. G. T. Thompson, solicitor, and Mr. Hall, a gentleman residing at Hythe, were also injured, but not seriously. Lieut. Thompson was the Coroner for the borough, and was held in the highest esteem by all classes of the inhabitants.

VOLUNTEER INSPECTION.—Some useful changes are being carried out in the arrangements for the inspection of Volunteer corps. Each district has first selected of appointing the Assistant Inspectors to the several military districts have been brigaded. The appointment of Major Dick, late Inspector, ward is regulated by the population of the different localities. The Staff of the appointment has also been altered. Lieut.-Colonel Forbes, late of the Military Train, will be Deputy Inspector-General, and, in the absence of Colonel M'Murdo, will act for the Inspector-General. The Brigade of Guards is divided for. Major Douglas Jones, late Aide-de-Camp to Lord Metcalfe, has been appointed to the Scots Fusilier Guards, and Major Dick, late of the Rifles, promoted to the 19th Depot Battalion. Major Dick, late of the Military Train, has also been appointed Assistant Inspector, and three more will be speedily nominated.—Army and Navy Gazette.

The engineer of the Mersey Dock Board has been authorised to furnish to the Secretary of War a plan and section of the wharf-wall which has been cut in the Rosslin landmarks, and upon which it is intended to construct a battery.

On the 1st of October an Act of Parliament will come into operation which will enable the public to send by their coachman or groom to receive their redirected letters free of the redirected rates of postage which are usually charged for that service. The Postmaster-General has also very wisely determined to allow the private letter-boxes to be delivered free of the foreign postage chargeable in the case of letters.

Within the course of a few minor details, the handsome memorial rock which has been some time in progress at Brompton Barracks, Chatham, to the memory of Sappers and Miners, commissioned officers, and men of the Royal Engineers who fell in the Crimea during the Russian war, is now completed. All that now remains to complete it is the cross, and a few months ago.



The 2nd Highlanders were paraded on Thursday week on the esplanade of the Castle at Edinburgh, for the purpose of receiving the medals awarded to them for the distinguished conduct they had borne in their struggle. The interest of the occasion was greatly enhanced in consequence of the medals being presented by Lady Alexander, the wife of Sir John, and late General Hawkeye, who was much affected. After the distribution Lady Alexander addressed a few words to the regiment, and also to the sick soldiers. Her Ladyship was received with enthusiasm by the regiment.

STATE OF CHINA.—The Chinese Court is, or at least ought to be, in a terrible state of perplexity. The Taeping rebellion is now bursting forth and threatening dissolution. The great imperial palace, with its circling outworks, is surrounded by a host of rebels, and the only consumption functions of a ruler—he can no longer even make soundness of his teeth—are being performed by the Emperor of the Middle Kingdom. Government has attained such a head that no money at all reaches the public service for which it is raised. The Chinese Times says that the soldiers of the Imperial armies were paid from the duties collected at the foreign ports, and principally from those collected at Shanghai by Lady Alexander, and that there funds have ceased to go to their accustomed purpose. The Imperial soldiers have not been paid for months. And now that the pecuniary means of the Chinese soldiers knows what the immediate consequence of this was. They did not get paid, and they did not fight. They deserted over to the rebels, and carried the heads of depredations. Shanghai escaped a sack because the English and French were there, but the Imperialists, who were paid and fed regularly and efficiently, and all the ready cash has been drained, the rebels make their assault and take the city. Such is the case at present in Shanghai, the nominal capital. Government has attained such a head that no money at all reaches the public service for which it is raised. Such is the case at present in Shanghai, the nominal capital. For eight years in the hands of these brigands, and as it is the only city that has been long just where it was. What is more precisely important to foreign merchants, the great emporium of the empire—Liverpool and Manchester combined—is in the hands of the rebels. Chinese merchants have rolled up into one—Hankow, which was a province of houses divided into four quarters, by two streets crossing each other at right angles, and with its dependent towns numbered eight millions of souls, has been five times taken and retaken, and the rebels now occupy three of the quarters. Dr. Medhurst, Captain Sherard Osborn's sailors found pheasants among the ruins of the Taitsang. In Chinese Hankow everything is changed. Even the Chinese dress is changed. A stranger or a native must have a drawing, a screen, a fan, a piece of embroidery, or some such work of art to show that he is not a spy of the Taeping Rebellion. This great city, within easy water communication of Shanghai, was the object of attack by the Taeping rebels, and was taken by them. It was the man who has succeeded in smuggling himself into Soochow. The last telegram that we have received from China is that Soochow is taken. What civilisation there was in China is being turned out and trampled out.—Times.

LITERATURE.

ON OBSCURE DISEASES OF THE BRAIN AND DISORDERS OF THE MIND: their Pathology, Diagnosis, and Treatment. By FORBES WINSLOW, M.D., D.C.L., Oxon, &c. John Churchill.

The necessity of accurate investigation into the phenomena of mind, as the basis of judicious modes of treatment in mental disease in all its phases, would seem to be so obvious a proposition that in this enlightened age it stands in no need of elucidation. It is nevertheless, a fact that no writer on disease of the mind or brain has attempted to lay down principles for the recognition of symptoms which precede these affections, and while they are in that stage which admits of both prevention of further mischief and cure. Therefore it is evident that no progress has been made in the science of mind, while it increases our responsibility, exposes us at the same time to a multitude of errors, of which a full share will be found in all the treatises on disorders of the mind—viz., in a variety of classifications, definitions, and ingenious hypotheses, conveying different interpretations of the same facts, and deducing various universal laws from particular facts, or by jumbling together inaccurate observations and experiments, making his own theories and synthesis from incomplete data must always involve failure; and that which was wanted above all other contributions to this important subject was a treatise which took a view of the whole subject as should reduce the results of past years of investigation into a perspicuous form, freed from hasty conclusions and speculative theories, and exhibiting by a clear and logical process such a distribution of elementary materials as might be made the solid basis of all future inferences, deduct

THE COURT.

The Queen on Thursday evening, the day after the arrival of the Court at Balmoral, walked in the grounds adjoining the cottage occupied by Her Majesty's attendants. Previous walks were carried out in the neighbourhood. On the afternoon the Prince Consort and the Princess Louise, when 18 weeks were driven to Mar Lodge en route to the Falls of Garbrock, attended by Major Bjelmstierna, of the Royal dinner party included Princess Alice, Sir George Bowyer, who had arrived from Holy Rood. Sidney Herbert as Minister in attendance, and her Majesty, Sir Charles Phipps, Sir James Clark, Dr. Robertson, and the ladies and gentlemen in waiting.

On Friday evening the Queen, accompanied by Princesses Alice and Louise, and by the Duchess of Sutherland and the Hon Emeline Hyde, drove to Altnagiuthasach, and rode home by Glenglider. The Prince Consort, accompanied by Prince Arthur, Lord Grey, and others of the suite, left the Castle on foot in the morning, drove to Abergeldie, when the weeds were driven for deer. The Royal dinner party included Princess Alice, Sir Charles Phipps, Lord Grey, and gentlemen in waiting.

On Saturday the Queen, accompanied by Princesses Helena and Louise, drove to the foot of the Falls of Garrawak. His Royal Highness the Prince Consort, with our gentlemen in waiting, shortly after arrived attended Princess Alice and Sir George Grey, with the ladies and gentlemen in waiting.

On Sunday the Queen, the Prince Consort, and Princess Alice attended Divine service in the parish church of Crathie. The ladies and gentlemen in waiting were in attendance. The Rev. Dr. Taylor officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Alice and Prince Leopold, and attended by the Countess of Desart, drove to Invercauld and honoured Mrs. Farquharson with a visit. The Prince Consort, accompanied by Prince Arthur, went out grouse-shooting over the moors of Invercauld, and had the honour of shooting with his Royal Highness. Sir James Clark was the only addition to the Royal dinner party.

His Excellency the Ambassador of France and the Countess Persigny, who were staying at Persigny, Cornwall, on a visit to Lady Molesworth, have since left, on a visit to Mr. and Lady Caroline Townley, at Townley Park.

His Excellency the Danish Minister will leave town at the latter end of the month for Denmark, for a short time.

The Duke and Duchess of Richmond, who arrived in town a few days ago from Goodwood Park, Sussex, have since left for Gordon Castle, N.B. They regret that, as regret is usual, they are unable to accept invitations.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Clanricarde have left town for Hembury, at which watering-place the noble Marquis and Marchioness propose to pass a few weeks.

Viscount and Viscountess Combermere have left Buxton for Combermere Abbey, where they are to receive a succession of visitors for the autumn.

Lord and Lady John Russell and family have left town for Scotland.

A marriage will shortly take place between Lady Rosina Stanley, only daughter of the late Lord Stanley of Alderley, and the Hon. W. F. M. Talbot, brother of the Earl of Shrewsbury. Lord Shrewsbury was married a few days since last to Lady Alice Villiers, daughter of the late and Countess of Clarendon.

PROGRESS OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The chief topic of interest to be found in the United States and Canadian journals is the progress of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The squadron arrived off Halifax on July 29, and the Prince landed the following day. The address of welcome, presented by the Mayor and Aldermen having been presented, the Prince rode on horseback to the Government House, where the members of the Legislature presented an address, to which his Royal Highness replied—

I am deeply touched with the warmth and cordiality with which I have been welcomed to this colony, and thank you most heartily for your address. It will be my duty, as it certainly will be my love to make known to the Queen my mother the loyalty and sympathies in the pride with which you regard the interests which are dear to Her Majesty and to her people. I am sensible of the honour of being here during the first visit of my country and yours. The sentiment you refer to will kindle the heart of every one of us, and of those who remain behind, as we have left them, and who, in the case of this colony which I have lately quitted, are enduring, with exemplary fortitude and patience, the hardships of a long and severe winter. The last few years have now elapsed since the international struggle which for the unexampled prosperity of this country were brought to a close. The peace and harmony amongst yourselves complete the good work which then commenced, and may nothing cause the happy relations which at present exist between us to be disturbed.

The Prince rode out in plain costume in the afternoon, and received a drenching before he returned; but he sat his horse as coolly in the rain as at starting. A half-past seven he dined at the Government House with Lord Mulgrave and a party of fifty-six gentlemen and officers. The fireworks were postponed on account of the rain.

Next morning his Royal Highness appeared in public in the uniform in which he landed, and, in company with all the members of his suite, rode in the dreariest of the troops in the garrison and the volunteers. He was received on all sides with enthusiasm, notwithstanding the immense concourse of people collected round the field. He was continually uncovering and bowing with the others. At about 2 o'clock twenty minutes to two he left the field amid a salute from the volunteer artillery, which was fired from the Citadel hill. He then inspected the citadel, and returned to the Government House to luncheon, after which he returned to the common to witness the rustic sports, which were composed of races. The Prince, in the best spirits all were their national costume, and attracted much attention. Several thousand people were assembled around the field. The Prince laughed heartily at the ludicrous games and scenes, and appeared very much interested in the foot-races, which were run by young men, of fifty guests, at the Government House. The whole town and the fleet in the harbour were brilliantly illuminated. The ball at the Province Building was attended by upwards of 2000 persons. About midnight the Prince arrived at the ball, accompanied by all the members of his suite and Lord Mulgrave. He remained before ten in the evening, and left at midnight, and looked remarkably well and good-humoured. He gave a reception to all present, and danced with them, and they passed him in single file. He danced afterwards with Miss Pitt, niece of the Premier, and the daughter of Mr. Pilsbury, United States' Consul. "His Royal Highness," the correspondent of the New York Herald informs us, "is a capital waltzer, and a very entertaining partner. He rests his purine frequently, and in the interval with cheerful conversation and remarks upon the company."

A grand regatta took place at Halifax on the 1st of August in honour of the Prince, and passed off most satisfactorily.

The Prince seems to have ingratiated himself into the goodwill of every one, and even the publication of the newspapers was suspended, so that no business whatever might interfere with the general festivity.

His Royal Highness left Halifax by rail on the 2nd inst. for Windsor and Hantsport, and was warmly received at both places. He sailed from Hantsport on board the Styx for St. John, where he arrived on the morning of the 3rd inst., and took a most active part in reviewing the school children, who were drawn up at the gates, sang the National Anthem, and afterwards marched past the Royal party. The members of the Government and several members of the Legislature dined with the Prince in the evening.

The whole West Indies squadron would accompany the Prince to Quebec.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE QUEEN AND ROYAL FAMILY.—On Tuesday Mr. Mayall, the photographer, having received her Majesty's permission, gave a private view, previous to a public exhibition, of his recently-executed portraits of the Queen, Prince Consort, Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, and other members of the Royal family. The collection is somewhat numerous, Mr. Mayall having taken advantage of forty negatives, comprising his illustrious sitters in a variety of positions, singly and in groups. The majority are of the carte de visite size, now so popular. The portraits form the whole of the Royal family. As specimens of the art of photography, and as pleasing likenesses, the photographs are so successful that the Queen has ordered their exhibition and publication.

CABMEN'S CLUB.—A large body of London cabmen assembled on Cryston Common on Monday, for the purpose of inaugurating their London Cabmen's Friendly Society," as James Duke presided. The proceedings were of a very interesting character, and we cannot but wish success to a movement which is intended to benefit this useful class of public servants.

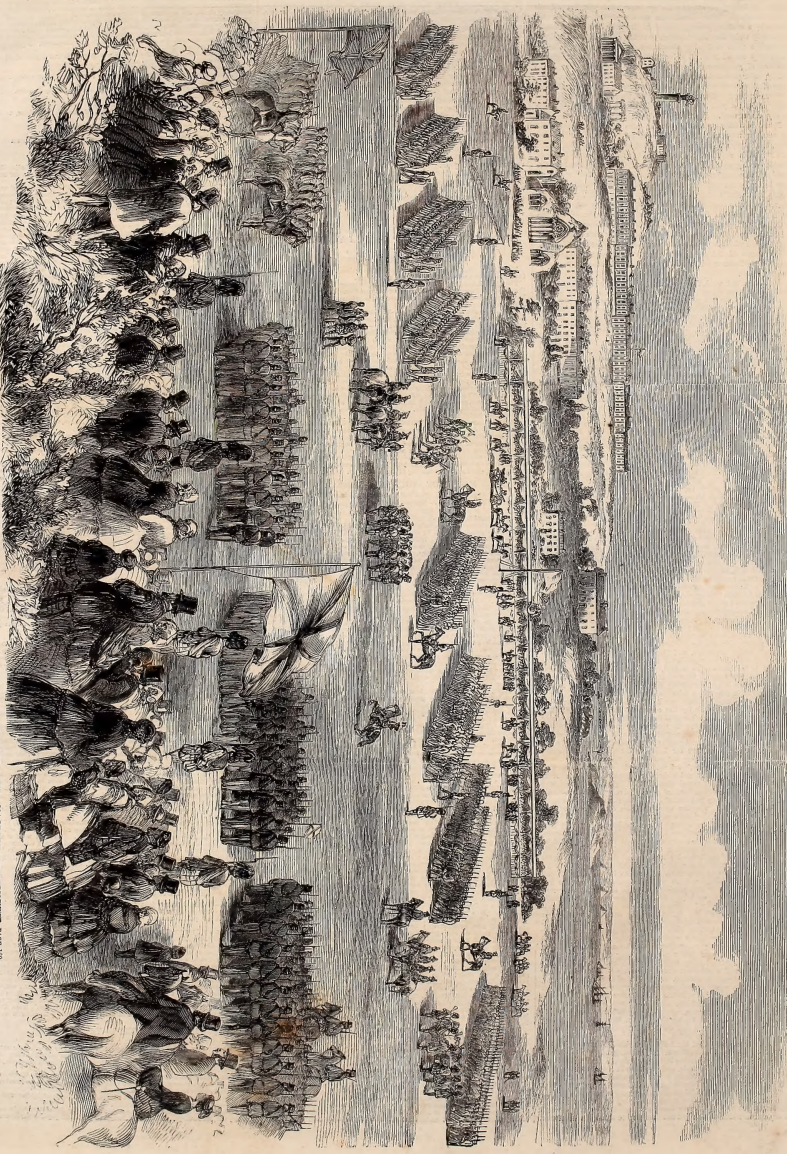
THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE.—Such is the name now given to the large and imposing structure which has recently been erected at Newington Butts, and which has been hitherto known as Mr. Spurgeon's new chapel. It was opened for worship for the first time on the 31st ult., within its walls, for a double purpose of returning thanks for the success of the undertaking, and of making an earnest effort to secure the necessary funds for the liquidation of the debt.

THE THUNDERSTORM OF SATURDAY.—Several persons are said to have been injured, and much damage done to property, by the thunderstorm of last Saturday. The steeple of Bow Church was struck by lightning, and the cross which surmounts it damaged. Bethnal-green appears to have been the chief scene of the storm. Mr. Cooper's house, in Green-street, suffered much from the effects of the lightning, and a horse was killed in a field at Dagenham, Essex, while in charge of a flock of sheep, several of which were also killed. Several miles of the electric telegraph were destroyed.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 857 boys and 799 girls—in all 1656 children—were registered in London. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59 the average number was 1359. The total deaths in the week were 1,035, and in the preceding week the number was 1047. If the deaths from epidemic cholera in the thirty-second week of last year should not be discovered, the return of mortality in 1865 is in the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week of the years 1850-59 became, 1,035 to 1,027, or a proportion of 1008 to 1000. Compared with this result, the deaths in last week were less by 228. Seven hundred and twenty-one died of the 1,035 in the week under review.

KEW GARDENS.—The flowers (almost endless in form, size, variety, and colour) in the great parterre or Italian Garden on the terrace in front of the Palm House, are looking their best at this time. The display is unique, and now in their greatest beauty and perfection, and will remain so for some weeks to come. The arrangement is, as it were, a combination for the exquisite beauty and variety of foliage, and the gorgeous splendour and rich combination of flowers, presenting, as it does, a mass of colour that plants now in blossom—gathering, festooning, and adorning the crystal pile, roof, and pinnacles of the Palm House, and the noble avenue of Pines." Several tropical botanical curities are also in flower in the aid and on remaining in the conservatories.

THE AMERICAN BEGGING-LETTER IMPOSTURE, which was exposed several months ago, has been revived in the City. At the Mansion-house Police Court, on Monday, the magistrate received from a gentleman residing near Birmingham a letter, which he had received, asking for aid, and which had been addressed to his father, now deceased, by a person living in North Carolina, in the name of Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Lee, who stated in the intimation that "poor dear Clement" was dying, and that, as the "most constituted" friend of the deceased, the writer now applied on behalf of the condition. The gentleman who forwarded this letter to Mr. Paynter at once sent through the United States Consul, and received information, shortly after the receipt of another letter, which was couched in precisely the same unassuming style, that the name of Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Lee was obvious, upon reading the announcement of the death of a gentleman of fortune of Birmingham, who had formerly resided there in his father's life, in the hope of finding dupes among his executors or surviving relatives.



MONUMENT TO THE LATE MR. ROBERT STEPHENSON.—A meeting of gentlemen interested in the memory of the late Mr. Stephenson, M.P., was recently held at Fenchurch Hotel, Westminster, for the purpose of taking into consideration the most appropriate mode of perpetuating the memory of the great engineer, the general respect for his memory. Amongst those present were Lord Lindsay, Sir Charles Lemon, Bart., M.P., Sir Thomas Bazley, Bart., M.P., Mr. Fowler, M.P., P. Gassiott, Mr. G. P. Bidder, &c. Lord Lindsay was unanimously called to the chair, and in a few words explained the object of the claims of Mr. Robert Stephenson to a public memorial. His Lordship reported that the Committee appointed at the last meeting had waited on and made to the Government for permission to place it within the area of St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, where, by the side of the grave, and between the graves of their professional labours and of the Parliamentary constituency he had represented for so many years, the remains of the late Mr. Stephenson lay. This request had met with the most favourable consideration, and every encouragement to the younger members of that profession to which Great Britain owed so much of its commercial greatness, and which the late eminent gentleman present addressed the meeting, and the following resolutions were passed:—1. "That a monument be erected to the memory of the late lamented for the character of the late Mr. Robert Stephenson, M.P., as appears to the meeting, be entrusted to a Committee of gentlemen now formed for providing the necessary funds." 2. "That the nobleman and gentlemen present form the Committee for carrying into effect the foregoing resolutions, with power to add to their number."

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—David Wemyss Johnson was tried at the Central Criminal Court, on Monday, before the Recorder and Sir James Ferguson, with a view to retort money. The witnesses, among whom was Mr. Hall, the manager of the Bank of Deposit, spoke to the prisoner handing the cheque in question. The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," and recommended him to mercy on account of his having introduced into which it may be inferred that they, like the rest of the public, regard him as the victim of a fraudulent system. The Recorder postponed passing the sentence until Thursday. It is as follows:—"The sentence of the Court is, that you be kept in penal servitude for the term of seven years. If you had not at the expiration of that sentence, you enter into your own recognisance in the sum of £100, and two sureties in the sum of £50 each, to keep the peace for one year towards her Majesty's subjects, and particularly those you have libelled. Your case has been considered by the Secretary of State, who are charged with the manslaughter of a patient, was postponed until next Wednesday. Mr. Serjeant Ellis, for the prisoner, said he had communications towards a poor child has excited the horror of the whole country, was tried, and found guilty of the wilful murder of Elizabeth Westland, by giving to Elizabeth Westland was charged with attempting to drown his child in a pond at Hackney. The jury found the prisoner guilty, but on account of her previous kind treatment to the child. She was sentenced to be kept in penal servitude for three years. The trial of Mrs. Ann Lee, charged on Thursday indicted for the wilful murder of his sweetheart, Mary Wells Daniel Purdy Lisle, Q.C., and Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, for the prosecution, Hayes and Thomas Seale Longmire, in Manor-place, Walworth. The jury found a fatal wound on the deceased's throat, and that it had been self-inflicted, but that the deceased was of unsound mind.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.—An announcement is made in the Times that the committee recently appointed has concluded its labours. The Committee consisted of the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Marlborough, the Earls of Strathmore and Devon, Lords Llanover and Charles Russell, Sir Lionel Pender Dimsdale, Sir Percy Egerton Herbert, Sir Thomas Bateson, Bart., and the Rev. Henry Bull. The Archbishop and Lord Devon were appointed chairmen, and the committee was divided into two courts. In the majority were regular in attendance at numerous meetings. On the petitioner complained that the committee had refused to go into evidence, committee here pronounced no conclusion; but they appear to be of opinion that the general charges of bribery, corruption, and treating were not considerably greater, and that the means available from the sale of the seized property are sufficient to meet the expenses. The Lord Chief Justice has not yet anticipated. The committee have communicated their report to the Dean and Chapter, and it is now in the hands of the printers. It is the intention to communicate it to the Old Westminsters in good time to allow of their annual conference on the subject. The Dean and Chapter have not yet come to a decision when a fuller meeting can be obtained than at the present time. In the meantime it is stated that the Dean and Chapter have a list of improvements which the committee have unanimously recommended to be effected in the Great Hall, and which will be carried out as soon as the funds are available. The report, in effect, finds fault with the want of regular, comfort, and convenience of arrangement in the Great Hall, and suggests that the Dean and Chapter, with the Dean and Chapter express their concurrence in a great many of the suggestions contained in the report, and intend to carry out the whole as far as it is possible. It is hoped that the general appearance and convenience of the whole place will be considerably improved, and that the means available from the sale of the seized property will be sufficient to meet the expenses. SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

A STRANGER in the approaches to the Palace of Westminster would be incredulous as to the fact that Parliament was still sitting. The long vista of Westminster Hall is dotted by a single policeman; in St. Stephen's Hall the statues gleam white in the empty spaces, and the pervading silence gives that impression of still-life which seems properly to belong to sculpture. In the central hall the officials of the Telegraph Office stand idle at the doors, or break the stillness by a scuffling practical joke. At the end of the interminable corridors up stairs the chief functionary of the Committee Office sits at his door in a state of dreamy abstraction, and the messengers are absolutely idle. In the committee clerks, these remarkable specimens of gentlemanly young men, who always appear to be working under protest during the Session, have vanished, and probably, wrapped in their gowns, and cocooned in their chrysalis-like chambers, are endeavouring to realise, with little success, the fact that that glorious holiday of half a year which is their proud privilege to enjoy has actually commenced. From the lobby of the House of Commons when the House is sitting you only hear the echo of the footstep of an Irish member now and then as he wanders towards the deserted library, the empty smoking-room, and the desolate refreshment-rooms, where it is to be hoped he may meet on to the usual consolation of excitable and gregarious gentlemen when they are placed in the painful and unwonted situation of being alone. The doorkeepers, no longer hailed as the endless objects of inquiries from strangers, appear in their huge chairs undisturbed, and, in consequence, are almost civil, and as nearly courteous as their nature, actual or acquired, will permit them to be. In the Committee-rooms the Clerks of Committees are busy—as busy as ever often to be seen seated quietly in the House than flitting from the door into the lobby with that gliding gait like pure which is peculiar to their official idiosyncrasy. Without, in the spacious Yard, the usual bustle has arrived at the close of a Parliamentary Talmor, while within everything betokens the beginning of the end.

Nevertheless, last week there were one or two spasmodic epipalos which afford some slight material for remark. The debate on the second reading of the bill providing for the expenses of the proposed fortifications, which was carried on in the House of Commons on Thursday, Sir Charles Napier, repeating in a wonderful manner exactly the same speech which he had delivered in the previous discussion, was restive that nothing was requisite for the defence of the country but ships; Colonel Dickson has acquired his military knowledge by virtue of his command in a regiment of militia, against the disembodying of which he has fought off and hard; was all for the old constitutional force; and Lord Ranelagh made almost his first appearance in the House this Session, and who has distinguished himself so greatly by his efforts in the Irish Militia, and consequently knows all that nothing of having eternally connected his name with the useful article of knickerbockers, insinuated his belief in the development of his grand conception by the introduction of a regiment of kilts into the country; while Mr. Sidney Herbert, summing up with the acuteness of a Judge in Equity, and with the glibness and quickness of an accomplished disciple of Ignatius Loyola, caused each one of his hearers to feel convinced by the simple process which he adopted, and waived the first contested portion of his audience that he meant to adopt just so much of the nostrum of each as would cover his own intentions and to keep out of sight those of all the rest. The discussion of the vote for the Galway contract for the conveyance of the mails by the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, and Mr. Cardwell, Secretary to the Treasury for exhibiting his remarkable qualifications for making things pleasant. One could hardly refrain from thinking that, in addition to his acuteness, he possessed Palace shrewdness by the chairman of that peculiarly-situated company; and that he had a slight tendency to lean towards the side of the scowl of indignant virtue which rested darkly on the countenance of Mr. Gladstone when he made a sort of speech which was neither fish nor flesh nor red herring, but which was, nevertheless, cognate to some species of his before now. The fact was that this little matter of the Galway contract was one of the incongruities with which the Right Honourable Mr. Disraeli, and he must have been wrathful at finding that by his Government occasioned by the unlucky fact of the Session of 1859. Who can estimate the mortifications which Mr. Gladstone has endured this Session, during which he has been obliged to submit to so many compromises of his financial policy as would have made any weight he sat on the Treasury bench in an attitude literally crumpled and crushed, looking by the end of the Session after a good many of the Budget items so moist and malefic to the floating adornments of the gentler sex. The cause was that Lord Palmerston had again thrown one of his cherished measures in the Lords' House, and, having done so, came into the Peers' seat in the Commons, and plonted lovingly over the discomfiture of his opponents. Of the Right Honourable gentleman it is not to think it is his business to control, in virtue of his office as Comptroller of the Household, the manners which we know Lord Palmerston, of a sincere, so it is not surprising that he should endeavour to find something to do in connection with his department.

Talking of the House of Commons, it is reminded that a little sensation was created in that assembly by the appearance of Lord Clyde on the occasion of the Budget night—not a sensation of the Commissariat or in India, in the course of which he spoke a few sensible, practical sentences in his usual, but brilliant, easy embarrassment, and he is the hero in one having authority. Having seen Sir Colin and gallant Lord a few days only before his departure for India, under circumstances which afforded every opportunity for the discussion of his personal appearance in reference to his "physique," we are enabled to say that his service in India has not affected his health in the slightest degree, that he looks as fair, and embrowned his complexion; but his figure is still erect, and his step as light and active as that of a man of only two-thirds of his years. The cheering which was raised by the House on his entrance, but in that old soldier, who has vindicated his claim to be ranked as a General, is a fact of the time.

The ordinary course of the business which has been going on in Parliament has been of a character which we have had to refer incidentally chiefly personal, which have occurred here and there. It would be unjust not to allude to a remarkable exhibition of spirit displayed by the Attorney-General for Ireland in the course of Mr. Bright's bill, and he stated, in a very small man, with a very slight figure, usually very quiet in his way, and remarkably unobtrusive in his manner, the explication of a matter not much in consonance with his physical development. Mr. Bright's bill for the Representation of Ireland Bill in that stuck on the system of Irish parsonage which was peculiarly irritating, and, as it was put by Mr. Bright, it was exposed to be blunted and noise, but with a peculiarly cold and cutting irony. Up jumped Mr. Deasy, and, inwardly suggesting a rush by a spirited batman on a lofty cavalry charger like a rocket, hissing and fizzing, he plunged into his antagonist, and, having wriggled and poked about him with immense energy and considerable success, he was at last seen to fall that was absolutely overwhelming. The fun of the thing was that, having been so much in the air, he did not get calm till night, but went in for a defence of the Peace Preservation Ireland Bill in that same Greek-fire sort of fashion, astonishing the recalcitrant Irish members, and probably laying up for the Irish Secretary a store of comparative quiet at least during the present Session. It is pretty certain that they have heard to that their Attorney-General can be dangerous when he is excited to action.

It is not to be denied that Mr. Bright has closed his career for this Session under a sense of discomfiture. That hon. gentleman took occasion to bring the privilege question in dispute between the Lords and the Commons once more on the tapis, and he did so in a very earnest, analytical speech, which, on the whole, did not seem calculated of itself to excite the towering passion into which Lord Palmerston got in his reply, and which caused him to administer something very like a severe castigation to Mr. Bright, who received it with unwonted meekness and downcastedness. It was afterwards found out that there were many adroit, outside, causes which encouraged the Premier to take the opportunity of exaggerated line which he adopted. Certain it is that, although the Lords have again, indirectly, ventured on asserting the principle of their co-ordinate authority with the Commons on matters of finance, the question of privilege has received its quietus for this year. Even the metropolitan member who has been nicknamed Lord Whitboy, and who, by virtue of his peculiar advantages as an Irishman, endeavoured to tack the repeal of the excise duty on paper on to the bill imposing new duties, and against which he failed at this period to the election of Marylebone, and resigned has pet stepping-stone to a little very prominent. At any rate, up to the time of this present writing, Mr. Bright has not reappeared in the House. Notwithstanding his repeated demands for the production of the Indian budget, he was not present on the night when Sir Charles Wood declared that it was the policy to a House of twenty-five members, with the front Opposition bench entirely deserted, to bring down the Indian budget in order to give Sir Charles a figure on which to fix his eye—a great assistance in speechmaking—and though Lord Stanley was not present at the beginning of the evening, he evaporated in a very short time beneath the eccentric heat of Sir Charles Wood's eloquence, probably assisted by the numerous cups of tea and coffee which this hon. gentleman purchases when he puts figures together. In fact, on that evening the catastrophe of the "Thirty Minutes' Adjournment" was reached by half a minute, when some officials came in just in time to enable the Speaker to count three members without the process of which at that hour an adjournment is imperative. Mr. Disraeli has disappeared; and, unless he is concocting a summary of the Session—which he will have to deliver to the Government assembled—he will probably be seen no more this year.

The Speaker has issued his usual invitation to the officers of the House. It is rumoured that the Ministerial whitebait dinner is fixed for a certain day, the little fish in question kindly postponing their appearance for the sake of the convenience of the noble Lord Mayor's Government; and therefore all things are culminating towards the vanishing point of the Session.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Census (Scotland) Bill and the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854) Continuance Bill were read a third time and passed.

The Poor Removal Bill, the Lunacy Regulation Commission Bill, and the Emperors Forces (India) Bill, passed through Committee; as did the Poor Law Continuance Bill, the Inclosure Commissioners Supplemental Bill, and the India Stock Transfer Bill.

CAPTAIN OF THE HONOURABLE CORPS.—The Earl of SHREWSBURY moved for correspondence commencing November, 1859, between Captains on the reserve list of the Corps of the Honourable Band of Gentlemen at Arms and the Lord Steward of the Household, to whom, he believed, justice had not been done by the new regulations which had been made. Those officers who, like himself, had retired after sixty years of age a retiring allowance of 18s. a day. The Duke of Newcastle said that correspondence would be laid before the House previous to participate in it.—Lord CREMORNE stated that he had been requested by his colleagues to say that they would not oppose the Bill, but that it had not in the present case he had followed the uniform practice of the Board of Admiralty, and he would, therefore, move the second reading of the Bill this day six months. The Bill was then read a second time, and committed for that day six months.

RETIRING PENSIONS TO THE CIVIL SERVICE.—The Earl of SHREWSBURY moved for correspondence concerning November, 1859, between Captains on the reserve list of the Corps of the Honourable Band of Gentlemen at Arms and the Lord Steward of the Household, to whom, he believed, justice had not been done by the new regulations which had been made. Those officers who, like himself, had retired after sixty years of age a retiring allowance of 18s. a day. The Duke of Newcastle said that correspondence would be laid before the House previous to participate in it.—Lord CREMORNE stated that he had been requested by his colleagues to say that they would not oppose the Bill, but that it had not in the present case he had followed the uniform practice of the Board of Admiralty, and he would, therefore, move the second reading of the Bill this day six months. CAPTAINS ON THE RESERVE LIST.—The Earl of SHREWSBURY moved for correspondence commencing November, 1859, between Captains on the reserve list of the Corps of the Honourable Band of Gentlemen at Arms and the Lord Steward of the Household, to whom, he believed, justice had not been done by the new regulations which had been made. The Bill was then read a second time, and committed for that day six months.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. Macdonogh's bill to confer certain rights on and for the borough of Sligo, in the room of the Right Hon. J. A. Wynne, retired.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

In the Committee of the whole House,

Mr. C. WOOD, in moving the resolution that it is expedient to enable the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise money in the United Kingdom for the service of the present year, explained that the Budget which he had to make a statement of the finances of India, Mr. Wilson had inaugurated new and measures of taxation, all the provisions of which, with the single finance accounts were on the table of the House. The deficit of the two years 1858-59 and 1859-60 was £8,000,000, which he proposed to meet by half a made in August last, and amounted to £4,168,980. The expenditure for the present year was estimated at £43,861,000, leaving a surplus of £2,000,000, during a deficit of £8,000,000. The estimate of expenditure for the coming year was £44,000,000, and the estimated receipts, on the present scale of £47,000,000. The military expenditure was estimated at £15,270,000, from which, if the Sepoy Army Commission saved, say £1,000,000, there would be for military expenditure. It was not possible to make any considerable reduction in the civil charges, which, in 1857-58, before the mutiny had been already proposed. In the last two years there had been a reduction in military expenditure of £6,000,000, in civil expenditure of £1,000,000, and also in the interest on the debt, which was an amount of £4,461,000, on a sum of £91,781,000. The debt now stood at £100,000,000, leaving by half a which was now £872,000, and no further reduction would be made in that item. Since 1857-58 there had been a deficit of £8,000,000, and a loss of taxes of £11,000,000, while the revenue had increased since then by £4,000,000, and the expenditure by £7,000,000. The estimated deficit for 1859-60 was £8,000,000, a deficit for the year ending 1861, if no new taxes were imposed, would be £12,000,000. Since 1857-58 there was due to the Bank of England and for open loans. Then recourse must be had to new taxes, and no income tax was at present in force in India. Mr. Wilson had, after much anxious consideration for a year, had been adopted by the Indian Legislative Council. They were taxes which, he believed, would produce their amount without serious difficulty. These taxes, it was estimated, would produce in the present year £3,000,000, and in the next £4,000,000, and not less than £5,000,000 when which was now £872,000, and no further reduction would be made in that item. Since 1857-58 there had been a deficit of £8,000,000, and a loss of taxes of £11,000,000, while the revenue had increased since then by £4,000,000, and the expenditure by £7,000,000. The estimated

The Lord Chancellor observed that the notice given by the noble Earl was premature.

Lord Monteagle deprecated the conduct of the Government in reference to this bill, and thought that a longer notice ought to be given by Earl Granville.

The Marquis of Salisbury said the general impression in the country was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer enacted by means of the Succession Duty bill to enable the public funds, and to make use of the money till he to enabled to dabble in the funds. But this was denied by the friends of the savings banks in connection with the loan that was originally to be granted.

The Duke of Argyll indignantly repelled the charge made against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and declared that the notice given by his noble friend was the result of the determination come to by her Majesty's Ministers at the last Cabinet Council.

The subject then dropped.

The Ecclesiastical Commission, &c., Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

At the morning sitting the Stamp Duties (No. 2) Bill was read a third time and passed.

The following bills were also read a third time and passed—viz., Exeter Turnpike Trusts, Bill; Lunacy Regulation Amendment Act Amendment Bill.

Sir G. Grey expressed his surprise that the new gentlemen-at-arms had not been sworn in, and not made the usual speeches on the occasion of their enlistment with the sheep, which the Pope was going on in Ireland. All he would say was that he behaved himself in a manner that put to all shame the noble Lord, who he hoped would be ashamed of himself.

Lord Palmerston said the Government were not aware that any such enlistment was going on as that referred to by the hon. gentleman. As to Mr. Hennessy, he subject was one of great difficulty in Ireland, as the hon. member was aware, in the case of the recent enlistments in India. They were going out the Pope, and he hoped the parties engaged in it were going out for the purpose of assisting in the making of railroads, which, no doubt, the old nun stood much in need of. The law must be so necessary that the enlistment should take place in this country to constitute an offence. He might probably regret to be informed concerning the enlistments that they might probably evade the law by saying that they were going out to the country to which they were doing (Laughter). As the matter now stood, he could not, from what he had seen, discern, because such a step would be an act of desertion.

Lord Palmerston said he knew of no such enlistment as that alleged. The noble Lord Mr. V. Scully said, of course, they were bound to assume that the noble Lord knew what he was talking about, and therefore applies. He (Mr. Scully) thought extraordinary that in the subscription-list got up for the relief of the Vincentian Fathers who were murdered in the first two names were those of Viscountess Palmerston and Mrs. Gladstone.

The subject then dropped.

The House again went into Committee of Supply, when several votes were agreed to, amongst which was £272,000 for the Irish national education system.

MONS MEG.

THIS gigantic piece of artillery in Edinburgh Castle one tradition avers to have been cast at Mons, in Flanders, and another in the Isle of Thrave. Recent research has, it seems, shown that the latter tradition is alone entitled to credit. "The gun was constructed (so Black's Guide to Edinburgh informs us) by Scottish artisans, by command of James II. of Scotland, and called Mollance, or Mons, after the blacksmith who cast it, and Meg after his wife, whose voice is said to have rivalled that of her namesake. The proper maintenance of Meg (the gun, not the wife) is a frequent item in the public accounts of olden time, in which charges are made for grease to grease her mouth withal

(to increase the loudness of the report), ribbons to deck her carriage, and pipes to play before her when going on warlike service."

The following particulars relating to Meg are from "Chambers' Gazetteer of Scotland":—"In March, 1828, an addition was made to the curiosities of the Castle by the restoration of a very ancient piece of ordnance called Mons Meg, which had been removed from the fortress in 1754. This gun, which is composed of long bars of lead iron, hooped together by a close series of rings, measuring twenty inches in the bore, is supposed to have been fabricated under the auspices of James III., who, in 1489, employed it at the siege of Norham Castle, on the border of England. It was rent in 1682 when firing a salute to James, Duke of York; and, though now quite useless, it is still held in high estimation by the Scotch, as a curious relic of the taste of one of their ancient and favourite princes."

The balls for Meg, at the castle, are made of Galloway granite, a strong presumptive proof that the gun is of Galloway origin. In circumference at the breech, and solid, Meg measures 16 ft. 9 in.

Mons Meg is 13 feet 4½ inches long: 6 feet 2½ inches in circumference at the breech, and 2 feet 1 inch in diameter at the muzzle: the bore being 20 inches in diameter. There is an iron plate 6½ inches thick at the back. The bore expands at the muzzle, seems to be 21 inches wide by 1 inch thick. These are overlaid by rings the whole extent of the gun, the rings being 3 inches broad by 3½ inches thick. There are two handles, making a fissure 6½ inches wide, 3½ inches deep, and 4 feet round the gun.

THE THEATRES.

ST. JAMES'S.—Nearly the only theatrical news of the week consists of the fact that this theatre has been opened for benefits and a summer season. Mrs. H. Marston, Mrs. Hickson, and others have appeared in "The School for Scandal." "The Rivals" and "The Lady of Lyons" are to follow. Mary Sullivan is announced for twelve nights' performances. Mr. Planché's "Fortunio" has been the afterpiece, and afforded opportunity for Mr. Joseph Robins to exhibit, in the part of the Engineer, his extraordinary burlesque powers. On Thursday "The Serpent's Opera" was performed, Miss Clara St. Casa appearing in the heroine to great advantage.

NEW ADELPHI.—The reconstitution of "Janet Pride" has proved a great success. It serves to illustrate more and more the Adelphi extremely artistic talent. It is with pleasure we observe that the benefit of Mr. William Smith, the stage-manager, will take place next Thursday.

AIM, BOYS, AND FIRE. A Rifle Recruiting Call. Song, with Chorus, composed by MAURICE COBHAM. Wessel and Co.

In all ages and countries martial music has been a concession of patriotism and martial feeling. In times of public excitement, when a brave people have been roused to arm themselves in defence of their country, the influence of their national music has been most powerful, and has been animated by the general spirit, and the song, the march, the warlike dance, have been the means resorted to for the public safety. Such is the case at the present time. The public mind is full of energy and resolution—sentiments which every notes full vent to in music and in publications to which such a state of things gives rise are numberless; and it is from a vast multitude that we have selected the few pieces at the head of this article, as having found them well worthy of special notice.

"The British Volunteer Rifle Quadrilles," though composed by a lady, are not only gay as dance music should always be, but have a great deal of martial fire. They are, moreover, written in a musician-like style, and are arranged for two performers on the pianoforte as follows and accessory to their harmonies. The only criticism which they suggest is that the beginning of the first part and the trio are different keys—an infringement of a rule generally observed, and undoubtedly founded on a principle of taste.

"The Scottish Rifle Volunteer Quadrilles" consist of popular Scotch melodies, appropriate in character and expression, and arranged in the quadrille form, very effectively and happily.

In regard to "The London Rifle Brigade Galop," the runs of its composer (Mr. Tutton), so long and favourably known to the public, is a sufficient guarantee for its excellence. It is, indeed, a spirited and admirable little piece, which will not only please the popular ear but will also gratify the musician; for, without displaying any great difficulty which belongs to this class of music, it contains (particularly to the "coda") a few bold and original characteristic passages, worthy of the hand of a master.

"The Rifle Grey" is the fine old northern air, "The Keel Row," with very animated words by Captain Shand, of the Edinburgh Rifle Volunteers. The verses are bold and joyous, as such songs ought to be, and are admirably fitted to heighten the spirit of a volunteer exercivial meeting.

Herr Kermesch's march, "Our Defenders," is a fine, yet simple, strain of martial music, which must have a great effect when played by a military band, for which any competent bandmaster can easily arrange it.

"The Rifle Recruiting Call," as we are informed by the titlepage, was "written for the band of the 1st Regiment of Middlesex, or the grand military bazaar of Edinburgh. It is a song for a single voice, with a chorus of voices in harmony of four parts. The music is lively, and the words (which are by Alexander Maclagan) are animated and inspiring.

ARCHERY.—The Cheshire Bowmen met in the park of Arley Hall on Wednesday week, through the kindness of R. A. Warburton, Esq., whose lady was the patroness and Sir E. M. De Capell Brooke the president of the day. The inauspicious state of the morning prevented the assembling of a large number of spectators, but the presence of the ladies and gentlemen of the district was sufficient to fully bustle and gentlemen to assemble at the target of the day. The ground was admirably adapted for the purpose, and the lady patroness was the first to place in the bullseye of Mrs. T. Kemp for the greatest score, who made also the most central hit, though given to the leader of the opposite side, Miss M. Cowper; in the second round the highest number of gods: to Miss M. Clowes for the most improved score on that of any lady-shooter at the last meeting; a great round, by the way, which the gracious score amongst the gentlemen shooters: to Mr. Bower for the next scoring gold and silver laced arrows respectively, and to Mr. Kemp for the highest number of golds. The day's gay proceedings were closed with a dance in one of the rooms of the noble mansion. The annual autumnal meeting of the County Dublin Archery Club was held last week, in the pleasure-grounds of Sandymount, on the property of Lord Talbot de Malahide, and adjacent to the ancient Castle of Monkstown. The shooting did not terminate until nearly after six o'clock, and then only for the day. The challenge prize and the first prize were won by Mrs. Macnamara, with a score of 81 points, and 9 hits. The second prize was won by Miss Macnamara, with a score of 242, and 34 hits. Miss Bethem and Miss E. Copland were in the field for striking the gold in the centre of the target, each having made four hits. Miss Garrett won the fourth prize for the best score—viz., 200 hits; and a second prize for the greatest number of target was awarded to Mrs. Gibbert. The first of the gentlemen's prizes was won by Captain Bethem, with 252 points and 34 hits; the second by Mr. De Burgh, with 228 score and 36 hits; the third prize, for most gold hits, was a tie between Mr. W. Rotherham and Mr. R. Copland, with 4 each; prize for most central gold hit, Mr. H. W. Archer; and the wooden noggin, for whole hits, was awarded to Mr. E. Rotherham. At the conclusion of the shooting the archers and visitors, to the number of 300, were entertained at a splendid déjeuner, provided at the joint expense of the committee; and in the evening there was dancing.

A CLUB SUPPER.—It came out during the hearing of a case in the Lord Mayor's Court last Saturday that thirty-three members of the "Social Club," consisting of barristers, officers, merchants, and gentlemen, commenced an eight-per thirty-eight-crown bowls of punch, in addition to considerable quantities of wine, liqueurs, and spirits.

Gold chains and valuable jewellery, worth more than £300, were stolen on Wednesday morning from the shop-window of Mr. Myers, Pentonville-crescent.

THE FIRST TRACTION-ENGINE FOR COMMON ROADS IN IRELAND.—The traction-engine, on Boydell's principle, which was made at the beginning of this year by Messrs. T. Bollaert and Co., of Eagle Foundry, Manchester, has arrived at its destination, and has had a satisfactory proof of its capabilities. The ascent from Mask to the city of Petropolis, 340 feet high, in a length of eight miles, was achieved successfully, and the steepest angles in the road were turned with ease and precision.—Successful experiments were made with the engine in the neighbourhood of Dublin, and other engines intended for Brazil. The engine, working twenty-five tons, and the trucks of the same weight, started to it, working up a gradient of one foot in nine of the park and the road paths without leaving a deeper track than that of a coal-waggon.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

IN the House of Commons, on Monday evening, a resolution was passed granting power to the Secretary of State for India to raise a loan of £8,000,000. Considering that the return will not be raised under £10 per cent, it is absolutely required, considerable future loans will be necessary. In the National Debt Office, on Tuesday, the loan has not exceeded 3 per cent; but, evidently, all persons are looking forward with much uneasiness to the continued operation of political matters on the Continent. The result is that every investment market is affected in Consols; but, on the other hand, sales have not increased to any extent.

The exports of bullion, partly to pay for foreign corn—the importations of which are on a most liberal scale, and not in excess of our requirements—and of which are as follows: the whole of our imports of gold are purchased for the mother country, and remain behind the specie in circulation. The exports of silver are principally to meet high rates in India, and are not likely to be considerably increased, every way long period of bullion to purchase silver and to meet that, consequently, for some time hence, there will be no additions to the stock of silver. The Governor of the Bank of England communicates with bankers generally, as well as the purely discount houses, have, for the most part, agreed to take the rate of 3 per cent for paper, at sixty days, which is considered moderately low with the present prospect before us. The current rates are as under:—

	Per cent.
Three months' bills	3 to 3½
Three months' bankers' acceptances	3½ to 4
Six months' bills	3½ to 4

The last return of the Bank of France shows an increase in the stock of bullion of about one million sterling. In other respects the return shows a considerable change in them. On the contrary, generally, money is to be had, as follows:—

	Bank rate. Per cent.	Open market. Per cent.
Amsterdam	3½	3
Antwerp	4	3½
Frankfort	3½	3
Hamburg	No bank rate	3
Paris	3	2½
Berlin	4	3 to 3½
Vienna	5	4 to 4½

In the Stock Exchange money on Government Securities is offering at 5 per cent, and the rate ruling for the best commercial bills is from 6 to 7 per cent, and the rate ruling for the best commercial bills is from 6 to 7 per cent, with seven days' notice, is 4½.

Letters from Alexandria state that the Government of Egypt have contracted a loan in Paris for £300,000, at 6 per cent.

Several additional companies have commenced this week; but, for the most part, their prospectuses are small. These or few new companies have been announced, the principal feature of which appears to be speculation.

The Australian Agricultural Company has declared a dividend of £2 10s. per share for the year 1859, and £1 per share for the first half of the present year.

The transactions in the shares of the newly-formed companies have been very moderate. Ocean Marine Insurance have been done at 2½ to 2¾ prem.; Overend and Gurney, Limited, 8½ to 11-16 prem.; Crystal Palace Debentures, 2-16 to 3-16 prem.; London and Provincial Marine, 5 to 6 dis.; Lisbon Coal, 1 to 1½ prem.; Bank of Australasia, 1½ to 1¾ prem.; Bank of Egypt, 1½ to 1¾ prem.; Livingston, par to ¼ prem.

In Mexicans, the transactions were steady in price; but the dealings in them were trifling. Realized and New Three per Cents were done at 21½ ½; Consols, New Annuities, and Reduced, 93¼ ¾; Ditto, Bonus, 1860, 93¼ ¾; Ditto, for Account, 93¾ ¼; Exchequer Bills, 1860, 1 to 3 prem.; Ditto, Debentures, 1860, 1 prem.; Ditto, Long Annuities, 1885, 3 to 3½ dis.; India Stock, 218 to 220; Ditto, Bonds, 1 to 2 prem.; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1861, 101 to 102; Ditto, Three per Cents Reduced, 91 to 93; Ditto, New Three per Cents, 91¼ to 93; Consols

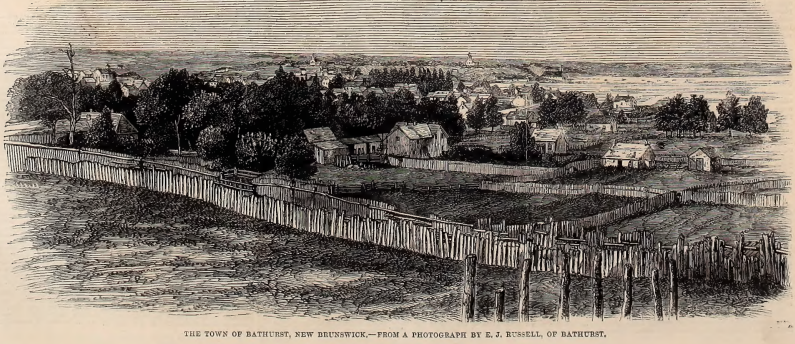
COPPER MINE OR QUARRY, NEAR MONTREAL, CANADA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, G. A. ANDREWS.



THE COPPER-MINE NEAR MONTREAL, CANADA.

THE commercial part of the community who reside in Montreal and the neighbourhood have lately been thrown into a state of considerable excitement by the discovery of an immense deposit of copper ore in the hillside near the village of Acton, Canada East, a small place, situated on the line of the Grand Trunk Railway, about forty miles from Montreal, between that place and Richmond junction. Not only the inhabitants of this part of Canada, but many persons from the United States, daily visit the spot. Excursion-trains run from Montreal expressly to visit the mines; and, as the proprietor makes a charge for admission to the mine, he is likely to make a rich harvest of gold and silver, as well as of copper, by his discovery.

The approach to the mine is through a wood of the ordinary character, about half a mile of which having been passed through, the visitor arrives at a wicket gate, where a fee is demanded for liberty to inspect the works. Entering the inclosure, an extraordinary scene presents itself. The face of a considerable hill has been laid open, and what appears a large stone quarry is being worked by about a hundred men, who are continually blasting with gunpowder, and using all the ordinary means for getting out blocks of dark grey stone, which, on a closer examination, will be found to be good rich copper ore. Two or three quarries have been opened on the side of the hill, and a shaft has been sunk to a considerable depth; and, so far as the search has been made at present, the whole mass of the hill appears to be of the same valuable material. The largest quarry now open is about eighty feet long by sixty wide and thirty deep, measuring from the highest part of the hill excavated. The overburden is a yellow loamy sand, about eight feet thick, immediately under which is the metal-bearing rock. The upper part of the formation is much cracked and dislocated, and quartz dykes intersect the hill in several places. The surface of the ground is ordinary forest. At the excavation the roots of the trees can be seen penetrating through the loam into the cracks and fissures of the rock which carries the metal. The yield of copper is eleven tons of ore, carrying 20 per cent of copper, for every cubic fathom of rock excavated.

BATHURST, NEW BRUNSWICK.

THE town of Bathurst, New Brunswick, is situated on the south side of the Bay Chaleur, at the head of a basin formed by the confluence of the Grand Nipisiguit, Middle Nipisiguit, and Tetagouche Rivers. Its exports are lumber and fish; the chief establishment of the former is that of Messrs. Ferguson, Rankin, and Co., who ship immense quantities of timber and deals to the British and other markets. Their saw-mill is considered the largest and best arranged in the province. Of the latter Messrs. Levy and Samuel, and Messrs. Underwood and Co. (Boston), export annually upwards of 50,000 cases of preserved salmon. These firms employ numbers of the French settlers of the coast in the catch of this fine fish. They have likewise establishments on the Miramichi and Richibucto Rivers similarly engaged. The Nipisiguit—or River of Troubled Waters, which is the Indian signification—is the favourite resort and spawning-ground of the salmon. As a river for fly-fishing it probably has no equal. It takes its rise among the lakes, 100 miles in the interior of the country; and, after traversing about 80 miles over a very rugged bottom of ledges and rocks, forming falls and rapids, at very short distances apart, it is precipitated over a mass of rugged granite. This is known as the Grand Falls. It is a very romantic cascade, or series of cascades, as it is composed of four distinct pitches. Tourists consider it the most beautiful in North America. In order to reach the foot of the Falls, the adventurer must enter a narrow gauge half a mile distant, through which the water is forced with fearful impetuosity. The light bark canoe, on the bottom of which the traveller is seated, requires the utmost exertions of two powerful Indians to pull it. Even with this force it will remain for seconds quivering on some surging rapid, the water defying further progress. At some seasons, when the river is high, it is impossible to get within hundreds of feet of the Falls. On each side of this gauge the rocks are perpendicular, rising in height from 200 to 250 feet, appearing as if rent asunder by some convulsion of nature. These falls form an impassable barrier to the salmon. The pools nearest are the favourite casts for the angler in the river. In some of the lowest rocky projections during the season sportsmen may be found from all parts of the world engaged in the "gentle art." Twenty and thirty fish have been killed by a single rod during a morning's fishing in these pools, the average weight about 15lb. Lower down the river is the Chain of Rocks, a very picturesque rapid, or succession of small pitches—the range of the "Middle Landing;" the Pahinaan or Cranberry Rock; the rapid of the Round Rocks; Bushey's Falls; and the Rough Waters, all of which afford excellent fishing. This really romantic stream possesses, Mr. Bouchette assures us, not only attractions for the tourist and angler, but the emigrant likewise. It is settled but five miles above the town. Thousands of acres of excellent land, on each side above the town. Thousands of acres of excellent land, on each side of the river, may be had by the intending settler at the rate of two shillings per acre, which may be either paid in cash, or by labour in the improvement of roads through the settlement, at an equivalent; so that, with the exception of a small fee for surveying the lots purchased, it is comparatively gratis to the settler—compelled to do in the great manufacturing districts of Britain for a scanty pittance, of bearing a yoke from at the end of the year's labour instead of a pauper's allowance after toiling all their best days,—such inducements ought to be sufficient for the seven-days,—such inducements ought to be sufficient for the seven-thousand persons nearly annually to take him away. The proposed Halifax and Quebec Railway now before British capitalists (and which ought to be constructed by a military and engineering point of view) would pass through this portion of the province, if Major Robinson's survey be accepted. This line crosses Tabusintac by the Palmetto.

In the neighbourhood of Bathurst there are, it is supposed, mines of copper. A company has been formed, composed by some American capitalists testing the same. The country in all directions gives indication of mineral wealth, requiring only skill and energetic to develop the treasures now hidden in the bowels of the earth.

THE REVIEW OF SCOTTISH VOLUNTEERS.

The review by her Majesty of Scottish volunteers in the Queen's Park, Edinburgh, on Tuesday week, passed off with the utmost success. Nowhere, indeed, in the British dominions could such a field for display be obtained as that which offers to such spectacle than that where the review took place. "Imagine (says the Edinburgh Courant) a large natural amphitheatre, in the best sense of the word, of considerable depth, from the level basement of which, sufficiently large for twenty thousand men to march and manœuvre without squeezing or crowding, there rise to the height of eight hundred feet a series of terraces, some bold and precipitous, some gently sloping, and it will be evident that, even if the Park had not been laid off by the hand of nature for the occasion, it could hardly have been better suited for the purpose to which on Tuesday week it was put. Going by the nearest road from the esplanade, you are struck with admiration at the sight which immediately meets you. Here and there on the hill-sides are groups of men and occasionally a number mmbers,' looking down upon you, dispersed in easy groups, or clustering thick as bees on every knoll and eminence, while hillside literally slopes down to the esplanade that cover them. You are baffled in the attempt to calculate the throng, and, with a relief from the sense of responsibility, look beyond the crowd to the highest feet of Salisbury Crags, away to the extreme right your eye rests immediately with pleasure on some military tents where the men are at their ease, busy refreshing themselves in the sunshine, at once gets effect from and gives it to the foreground, dark with the dress of the human figures, as against the sky and the rose. Whither ever all their stretches a noble canopy brilliant with the ever-shifting hues of light and shade. Going by the Queen's Drive, or be so imposing from the lower ground, where the view is of necessity broken and limited, how different it be from the loftier and grander site? There, on the extreme left, the view embraces entire the Royal turrets of Holyrood. Traversing the intervening space, you are attracted by the bright uniforms of field officers and their brigades

A RUN ROUND THE CAMP OF CHALONS.—THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON'S RECENT VISIT TO IT.

(By our Special Correspondent and our Special Artist.)

THE tendencies of the present phase of civilisation are decidedly military. To whatever side we look, the principle of organisation and discipline appears to be gunpowder, conveyed through the generally convincing medium of gun or cannon more or less rifled. The year 1860 has even found the same martial spirit extending to England, whose inhabitants had for a long period relied for the triumph of their cause upon other means than those "artificially cultivated" in the camp, on the plain, or the round field. With the arming now considered necessary, the use and practice of arms are becoming more and more indispensable; but these are not sufficient. In order to render military forces of real service it is requisite also that they should be trained to the hardships of life in the field. To do so properly is to undergo considerable voluntary fatigue and privations if called upon. The camps in England, the camps in France, the camps in Italy, the camps in Prussia, Spain, Russia, Belgium, Asia, and in Africa, even in America, in fact, almost everywhere (for it would be difficult to find a country without one), are sufficiently, or sufficiently nearly, to be able to designate the ne plus ultra—have all been established with this view in our century; we must but substitute the high degree of perfection of the French armies in campaign to the manner in which they are annually accustomed to live for a considerable period under canvas, whereby they are rendered at the same time hardier and more healthy than if they were confined to barracks.

The recent visit of the Emperor of the French to the Camp of Châlons—which, both on account of its extent and the number of troops annually assembled there, may be looked upon as the model of all camps, or to say the keystone of most of the others in Europe—induced us to make an excursion into the department of the Marne in company with our Artist, Bennett, of Italian campaigning memory. In the midst of a chilly August shower we made our way in a fiacre to the Northern Railway, where the camp seemed pretty well represented; for in the numerous corridors of the Paris station we encountered a large number of soldiers awaiting their departure by the special destination, or, as they say in picturesque groups on all sides. They did not go by our train, however, which soon started in the midst of a perfect deluge of rain, with a number of waiters vendors vociferating "Figaro" and "Garibaldi," and the usual accompaniment of a crowd attending the getting-up of a train. The line runs rapidly on our way to Chalons, through vine-clad slopes and occasional valleys, richly coloured by the productions of nature at this season, only enjoyed by the natives of Chalons, Chalons-sur-Marne, and Epernay, where we descended, as in duty bound, to take a glass of champagne at the buffet of the latter, at the town of Châlons, where we found a excellent quality and at a cheap price, much to the delight of thirsty travellers, and we, with no doubt, to the advantage of the wine-merchants of the neighbourhood. Shortly before arriving at Epernay we had remarked, on a beautiful height surmounting a perfect forest of vines where the delicious sacred nectar ripens with the genial influences of love, poetry, and military ardour, the splendid château of Boursault, recently built by Count Chandon, whose two younger brothers, the late celebrated Mdme. Cliquot, of A 1 champagne notoriety, as a present to her son-in-law, M. de Mortemart. Another short spin of twenty-one kilometres brought us to the town of Châlons, where whose hospitable walls we took up our abode for the night at an ancient hostelry styled the Hôtel du Cygne. Quite City, as it is commonly termed, with a double-bedded room of the enormous dimensions usually allotted to travellers in the "good old times," we found but a single bed of modern construction, in which the number that can be accommodated rather than the quality of the accommodation is the principal anxiety of the proprietor.

At a very early hour of the following morning we were on foot, and proceeded to the railway connection, which is established close to the camp nearest the head-quarters; for, be it remarked, the camp, although named Châlons, is situated at a distance of some fourteen or fifteen miles from that venerable town. At the same time the new establishment of this new fungus encampment in the arid plains of the Champagne Pouilleuse, as it was called in former days, is not only to be reached by diligence, of foot or on wheels. The Emperor at once expressed his will to the contractor for the line of railway from Châlons to the village of Petit-Mourmelon, from which the immense streams of fents first become visible. The Eastern Railway Company have commenced their work, and the line is now completed in the extraordinarily short space of sixty-two days, much to the delight of the inhabitants of that hitherto desolate part of Europe. However, the camp only commences at this spot, and so we pushed on at once to its real city, the late village of Grand-Mourmelon, as it is now called, distant about half an hour's drive from the Petit-Mourmelon. Of course, greatly extended during the last three years, and is at present quite remarkable for the multitude of its canteens and refreshment-houses, only made use of for the most part during the sojourn of the visitors attracted by the camp during the months of June, July, and August, when is life and bustle, from early morning till very early morning again; hundreds of soldiers, suit down with bags and baskets to the bakers and butchers of the place for supplies; crowds of pedestrians and carriages pass through at a gallop; and loungers of all descriptions, civil and military, pour eastwards on the Sunday—every day, indeed, more or less, at least, possesses the merit of novelty, and, at the same time, a little of everything to be found in the French civilisation. The only hotel in Grand-Mourmelon being full, we were obliged to take up our quarters in a maison meublée of the fragile description above alluded to, the access to our somewhat bellicose being by a ladder and trap-door placed at the back of the temporary pile. Every sound in the house during the noisy night and night hours perfectly audible to every one in it, we were so little satisfied with the accommodation for "sweet repose" that we determined for the rest of our visit to take up our quarters in the camp itself, where we met with an hospitality characteristic of the moral of the officers with whom our Artist had become acquainted during his voyages in the Crimea, in Lombardy, and in Italy throughout the Italian campaign.

Before proceeding to describe our Illustrations, we will endeavour to give some idea of the general aspect of the camp. Except at the head-quarters, and in the so-called Infantry Barracks quarter, there is nothing about it to realise the idea usually entertained of a military camp is spoken of. The extent of ground occupied by the camp is so vast, that upwards of seventy thousand men disappear, as it were, in the midst of the immense plain, and there is no crowding whatever, and every regiment has a small district to itself. The tents, around many of which tastefully-laid gardens have been planted, are mostly placed in double lines; and the strictest order is observed within each of these military districts, everything placed at certain distances from the regiments as well when the troops are exercising in front of their encampment as when they are under canvas. Notwithstanding this separation of the different regiments, which is of course highly conducive to their health, there is no want of picturesque animation in the camp: the constant neighing of horses, the beating of drums, the occasional music of troops at exercise, the passage of military waggons on their way to the artillery park, and the rolling stock of various descriptions for this large mass of soldiers, and the troops of horses being taken to water, afford a succession of interesting attractions to civilians, rendered still more pleasant by the absence of anything like crowding or confusion. Only once did we have to complain of an excess of sound, and this was during a storm in front of the Zouave quarters, where the Ecole des Tambours, near the quarters of the 7th Chasseurs, in which the practising of drums by hundreds at a time produced a most mendiously noisy but headache-producing harmony. The greatest difficulty in a camp of so great an extent is experienced by persons who may have to go from one to the quarters of another regiment; for, although from eighty to one hundred thousand men muster from time to time in front of the Emperor's tent, the distance, it is in such occasions quite impossible to communicate with individuals; and it is no pleasant information to be told that the quarters of the regiment after which you inquire are some five or six miles further on to the right or the left, as the case may be. In consequence of its great expanse in each division of the camp there has been erected a wooden tower of observation overlooking a large portion of the vast plain. At night the summits of these towers are illuminated to indicate the lines of tents. One of them is shown in our Engraving of a part of the cavalry quarters.

During the second week of the present month the camp was enlivened by the visit of the Emperor, who generally passes some weeks of the autumn at the head-quarters every year. His Majesty paid this special visit for the purpose of bidding adieu to the troops leaving for the Syrian expedition. More than ever has the air of "Partant pour la Syrie" become a favourite with the French soldiery, and it is now constantly sung and played by them. The Grand Duke of Baden also arrived at the camp shortly after the Emperor; and on the 9th instant the little Prince Imperial went to join his august father, to be present at the grand review of grand manœuvres ordered on that occasion by his Majesty by all the soldiers under the command of the Duke of Magenta. The Imperial Prince followed the movements in an open carriage by the side of his father. The Emperor, on this plain, or evolutions his Imperial Highness mounted his pony and passed in front of the troops, who received him with the loudest acclamations.

Owing to the great extent of the camp, we found it no easy matter to select points for illustration. The designs of our Artist, all made on the spot, will, however, give a tolerable idea of the most striking features represented in our Engravings, which we will endeavour to describe as briefly as possible.

THE CAVALRY QUARTERS.

The encampment of a regiment of Hussars forms the subject of our illustration of the Cavalry Quarters, and it presents on the whole once of a street inhabited by an equal number of human and equine beings, only the former are accommodated with a tented covering, while the latter are only protected by the canopy of heaven. Fortunately they are of the hardy Arab race, light and enduring, undergoing the inconveniences of the weather with little injury to their masters, who are, moreover, uniformly kind to their steeds. Nothing can be more picturesque than the different attitudes of these graceful horses, some lying down on their straw litter, or lazily nibbling from off the ground. The rows of tents, each of which is adapted for eight troopers, are also arranged about twenty-five feet apart, and this further extremity is one of the towers of observation mentioned above, outside the camp, and which is occupied by an officer of sentinels, some mending articles of apparel, others furbishing up accoutrements, while frequent recourse was had to the pails of blacking and brushes to keep the leather in order. The regimental band was likewise at work under and around the tents was so varied as to render it difficult to believe that only the men belonged to the regiment; and in this case and liberty appears to be looked upon by the soldiers as one of the greatest charms of camp life.

THE INFANTRY BARRACKS.

It must not be supposed that the barracks here represented are for all the infantry, which is for the most part under canvas. The accommodation afforded by the Infantry Barracks, which are, and are usually occupied by the Imperial Guard when it is present at the camp for the autumn manœuvres, is very limited. Numerous additions to the building serve for exercising-grounds, and in one of them some soldiers of the line in undress uniform are seen going through their performance under the eye of their sergeant. The accommodation in the infantry barracks, arranged as streets, is being increased, and they will probably afford shelter to the winter quarters for the accommodation of several regiments of infantry.

INTERIOR OF THE SOLDIERS' THEATRE AT MOURMELON-LE-GRAND.

In our second Illustration page of the present number we have given an invitation to visit the (new) military theatre, situated in the Tivoli Gardens, which are in a hollow alongside the high street. This theatre, built in the form of a Roman amphitheatre, and open at the top of upwards of 4,000, was opened as a private speculation in 1857, during the time that the camp was formed there for the reception of soldiers used to send up to the camp six hundred free admissions for the common soldiers every time there was a performance. The granting of the free admissions for admission to go to the theatre was found to exercise such a powerful influence on the conduct of the troops that the length the privilege was suspended, and only restored, after a short interval, by the Emperor, upon the theatre being placed under the direction of the camp, and now allows the proprietor 6000f. a month for the camp, and now allows the proprietor 6000f. a month for the camp, and now allows the proprietor 6000f. a month for

THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, AND THE NEW PRESIDENT.

THE REV. W. WOOD STAMP.

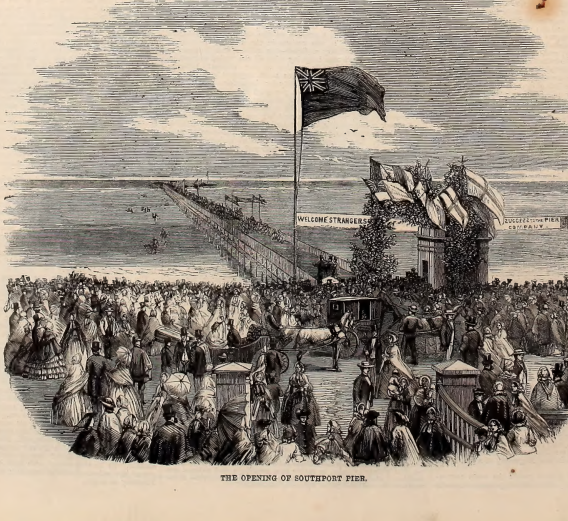
THE annual meeting of Wesleyan ministers, known as the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, which was this year held in London, closed on Saturday last; and, the Conference journals having been signed, the ministers in attendance (more than four hundred) departed to their several allotted spheres of ministerial labour. The business comprised, beside the discussion of various interesting proposals afterwards referred to various committees, the reappointment of the Rev. W. L. Thornton, M.A., and the Rev. G. Wilson, as the connectional editors, and of the Rev. J. Mason as the book steward; the presentation of the thanks of the Conference to Dr. Etheridge, of Ireland, for his "Life of Dr. Coke;" the review of a tabulated statement of the numbers in the society, presented by Mr. Dickin, and showing a large increase; the authorisation of collections all over the world for the purchase of the lease of the venerated City-road Chapel (John Wesley's), which is about to expire; the consideration of a large number of memorials from various circuits (praying for various objects, and one of them from Birmingham, stating the great pain felt by the memorialists on reading the evidence of the Rev. George Osborn and Mr. Perceval Bunting on church rates before the Lords' Committee, which they conceived did not properly represent the feelings of Wesleyans generally, and expressing approval of the principle of non-interference generally adopted by Methodism in political questions, &c.), and the stationings of the preachers.

Considering the large amount of influence exercised by this Conference and, the important results of the decisions at which it arrives, we have thought a Portrait of the President, the Rev. William Wood Stamp, would not be uninteresting to our readers. It is scarcely necessary to remark that to be elected President of the Conference is at the same time a high honour and a heavy responsibility, and it says something for the general opinion of Mr. Stamp's qualifications that he was elected by a majority of eighty-four votes, although the next candidate was the well-known John Rattenbury, of Bristol.

Mr. Stamp was born on the 23rd of May, 1801, in Bradford, Yorkshire, and is the son of the late Rev. John Stamp, forty years a minister in the Wesleyan Methodist connection, and for seven years the governor of Woodhouse-grove School, an establishment for the education of the sons of Wesleyan ministers. From his mother, who was the daughter of Mr. John Wood, of Northaven, Beverley, Yorkshire, Mr. Stamp received that sort of training best fitted to imbue him with those sentiments which were necessary to make him the fitting representative of the cause of Wesleyan Methodism, and he left her early care to enter the school of which his father was for many years principal, a school, by-the-way, in which many men now holding prominent positions in the world were instructed. After spending some three years and a half at this place Mr. Stamp was removed to pursue his studies for the medical profession, which was the career his father had chosen for him; but during his apprenticeship he became convinced that he had work to do as a preacher, and accordingly communicated his intentions to the Rev. John Gaulter. Like many of the early Wesleyan preachers the scene of his first efforts was a very humble one; it was, indeed, no other than a room in a place near Lincoln's-inn, called "Narrow Hall." This room was occupied by a poor woman who "took in" mangling, and Mr. Stamp has since been heard to say that his first sermon was delivered "to six old women and a mangle." After passing through the usual examinations Mr. Stamp was received by the Conference of 1823 as a probationer, and ordained fully in 1827. His public career has been a highly honourable one; and, uniting a sound and comprehensive judgment to practical habits of business, he soon became the superintendent of a circuit, and had some of the most important Methodist stations intrusted to his care.

It would seem that Mr. Stamp has been particularly successful in originating plans which have ultimately freed various chapels from debts considered almost insurmountable. His peculiar adaptability to business matters, as well as an intimate acquaintance with all the laws and customs of the Wesleyan body, have rendered Mr. Stamp peculiarly eligible for the office of President; and his present physical and mental vigour gives promise of his carrying out its duties with energy and ability. Mr. Stamp has written, beside occasional magazine papers and essays, a History of Methodism in Bradford; and a Memoir of the Rev. John Crabtree, Vicar of Bradford. His literary productions, like his sermons, are rather sound, logical, and distinct, than brilliant, but are indicative of that practical character which has so eminently fitted him for the work he has had to do.

Our Portrait is from a photograph recently taken by Messrs. Eastham and Beeson, of Regent-street, who have been commissioned to take portraits of the principal Wesleyan ministers.



THE REV. WILLIAM WOOD STAMP, PRESIDENT OF THE WESLEYAN METHODIST SOCIETY FOR 1860-61.

SOUTHPORT PIER.

THIS light and elegant pier is erected on the extensive sands at Southport, a watering-place on the Lancashire coast, about thirty-seven miles north-west from Manchester, and twenty miles north of Liverpool. The locality has lately become well known from the interesting experiments with the Whitworth guns having been made there. The salubrity and cleanliness of Southport are now so well appreciated that it is rapidly gaining renown as a fashionable watering-place.

The pier, which was opened with great éclat on the 2nd inst., has been erected by a company, under the Limited Liability Act, from the designs of Mr. James Brunlees, civil engineer of London. The total length is 1200 yards, or nearly three-quarters of a mile, commencing at the middle of the Promenade. The height of the platform from the level of the sands varies from 13 feet at the town end to 22 feet 6 inches at the sea end. The superstructure is supported upon cast-iron columns, three to every pier, each column being cast in three lengths. The bottom lengths, or bearing-piles, were sunk to the necessary depth by a peculiar process, first adopted by Mr. Brunlees in obtaining a foundation for the viaduct over the sands at Morecombe Bay, on the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway. The bottom of the pile being provided with a flat disk eighteen inches in diameter, with a small hole in the centre, a length of two-inch gas tubing was passed down the pile into the sand and the joint made tight. By means of a pipe connected with the water company's mains a pressure of water of 50lb. to the inch was obtained, which forced the sand from under the disk, thereby enabling the pile to sink by its own weight on the pressure being removed. So firm a bearing was obtained that, although severely tested with a load, not the slightest settlement could be detected. Had not the water company's mains been so near at hand a forcing-pump would have been used, as at Morecombe Bay. The superstructure itself is formed by a triple row of lattice girders, of fifty feet span and three feet deep, securely braced and covered with a footway of three-inch planking, open-jointed, to prevent the lodgment of water. The sides are protected by a wrought-iron railing, designed especially to prevent the possibility of accidents to children. A platform, with seats all the sea end, one hundred feet long and thirty-two feet wide, with stairs for descending to the sands at low water, will prove a great acquisition to visitors wishing to encounter the breeze at the elevation of the pier, or the milder air at the lower level of the sands. The work was commenced in the middle of August, 1859, and has been very creditably executed by the contractors, Messrs. W. and J. Galloway, of Manchester.

THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.

SICILIAN SKIRMISHERS ATTACKING THE ADVANCED POSTS OF THE NEAPOLITANS ON THE LEFT FLANK AT MELAZZO.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

THE BATTLE OF MELAZZO.

OUR Special Artist in Sicily has forwarded to us, with other Sketches illustrations of two striking incidents in the battle of Melazzo, which are here engraved; and we annex a portion of a very animated account of the battle written by the Times correspondent relating to them:—

"The dispositions taken on the Sicilian side were—the left, under the command of Colonel Malarchibi, consisting of two battalions of Tuscans and a battalion of Palermitan recruits, was to advance on the road close to the seashore and go right at the town of Melazzo. The centre, under the orders of Medici, and composed of his first regiment of four battalions, all old troops, some from Lombardy, was to advance by the direct road from Miri; one battalion of the 2nd Regiment was to take the main road to Messina, starting from Corioli, and was to be joined by the battalion from St. Lucia. The centre and right were to unite by the cross road nearest to Melazzo, and then work up their way united towards Melazzo. A body of Sicilians, under Colonel Fabrizi, was to take position on the extreme right at Arcile, so as to oppose any attempt made from Gesso to assist the force at Melazzo. A second line and reserve, the troops arrived with Garibaldi, were placed together with the troops which had come up with Cosenz.

"At dawn the columns started, and by six a.m. the first firing was heard on the left. The open beach gave the advantage to the Neapolitans of employing their artillery on this point more successfully than at any other, and while the column to the left, without artillery, tried to sustain this unequal struggle, the centre found itself likewise in face of the enemy. Leaving the narrow road, inclosed on both sides with garden walls, they penetrated into the gardens on both sides to attack the enemy, whose advanced posts had taken position in some detached houses not far from the point where the first cross road joins the main road of Miri at the hamlet of Le Grazie. The troops belonging to the second expedition, eager to regain the lost time and rival the victors of Calatafimi and conquerors of Palermo, soon drove the enemy's outposts from the detached houses; but it required considerable exertion to make him leave the cover behind. Invisible to the eye, he fired with deadly aim at our advancing troops, penetrating numbers of them without suffering himself. Frequently the cover was so thick that not even the puffs of smoke were visible; it was the most trying thing to the soldier to fight against this formidable phantom adversary, who seemed inaccessible. Any general disposition became impossible, the men of one company often scarcely seeing those of the next, much less those of another. The road, which at first sight seemed to be the most difficult point, proved easier than the rest, for there, at any rate, one could see the adversary and his movements. The only tactics possible under these circumstances were to push on the road, and thus take in flank and rear some of the nearest cover of copse; and, on the other hand, to make a bold push through the cover, unmindful of losses, to gain the rear of the enemy in front of the road. The heavy losses, and the almost unequal fight entailed on the attacking forces, as well as the necessity to concentrate the whole disposable force, which the nearly could alone execute without being seen, reduced very early the number of the reserve.

Although the whole movement was under the orders more especially of Medici, Garibaldi was, of course, the soul of the fight, finding himself invariably at the point most crowded, and where danger, as it is his wont to do. He was with the centre, which was making its way slowly over and through the thick brushwood, when the news arrived that the left, which overlapped the superior forces of the enemy, was giving way, and thus exposing the whole line to be turned on that side. Taking half a company of reserve, a battalion then composed of North Italians and Palermitans under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Dunne and several other English officers, he went to the left to stem the advance of the Neapolitans. His presence and the exertions of the officers of the battalion moved the confusion of those young lads, who not only resisted further attacks, but pushed forward towards the guns with which the enemy was sweeping the road. Just as the soldier laid hold of the first limber to drag the guns; an English sailor, lately visited at Paltì, was the first across the wall behind him and the guns were captured, and the same moment the gun was carried off in triumph. Just at the moment when it was disappearing behind the curve in the road, the cry arose of "Cavalry—cavalry!" and confusion. An unsuccessful attempt of Garibaldi and of the officers to overcome this bugbear of young troops; they scented among the guns on one side, and, jumping a ditch on the other, they opened a road to about a dozen bold horsemen of the Chasseurs à Cheval, who, with their Captain at their head, rushed through this breach in time to recapture the gun. Garibaldi had only time to step aside when the horsemen passed, sabring right and left. But they did not last long, for after the first panic the infantry recovered and soon emptied the greater part of their saddles. Cougnet, a Hungarian, and a private tried to make their escape, and would have succeeded but for Garibaldi's personal bravery. He went into the middle of the road, and, having left his revolvers in the holsters when he dismounted, he drew his sword, and placed himself in a position to stop the Captain. The only person with him at the time was Captain Missori, of the Guides, who had likewise on foot, but armed with a revolver. His first shot, wounding the horse of the Neapolitan Captain, brought it on its haunches; Garibaldi seized hold of the bridle, intending to secure the Captain as his prisoner. But the Captain answered to the demand to surrender by a blow with his sword at Garibaldi, and retaliated, while cutting the Neapolitan Captain with one stroke down the face and neck, and pronouncing him dead at his feet. While Garibaldi was thus engaged in this single-handed combat, Captain Missori shot down the Sergeant who came to assist his officer. This one dispatched, he seized hold of the private who had run away, when he, in his retinue, shot him also with another barrel from his revolver."

This brilliant incident, we are told, prevented a little to animate the troops on the left, and they soon came up in a line with the centre,

THE PLACE FOR SUMMER ENJOYMENT.—It is pleasanter to spend the summer in the country than any other place than by the sea. The sea is too glaring in sunshiny weather; the prospects are too extensive. It wearies one's eyes to look without and make out a boat or distant sail across the water. The true locality in which to enjoy the summer time is a richly-wooded country, with lots of hedges, hedgerows, and trees, and not everywhere—mere objects for the most part are near you: and, above all, no grass. It is pleasant to live in a shirt-sleeve state in order to prevent broad brightness, in whose centre you feel as if you were condemned to remain a prisoner, and to watching through the holes in your jacket the sovereign short of a four-in-hand looks so insignificantly small. Give me country-town, the nearest thing to a village that can be found in our modern day, so narrow that the eye without an effort takes in the green hedges and fields at every bird's drive or walk-stage.—Every Man his own Doctor.

CHANGE OF AIR IN SICKNESS.—Change, a change of air, is of the very first importance in sickness, as the illness of the country. Everybody must have remarked how a person recovering remains sometimes for weeks in a state of apparent progress, yet with apparently no progress, no matter with him. The change from a ground floor to an up-stairs ward will sometimes be quite sufficient to make the patient feel as if he were across the water. CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. M.—The conditions of the Cambridge Problem Tourney were published by us in a recent number of this paper.

W. Corbett.—It is impossible to believe that two such games could have been played by correspondents between "strong players." They are evidently the work of quite young hands, and have hardly a single move worthy of attention to mark. Let the contestants arrange another match, and, during its progress, undergo a severe course of study in the openings.

The Sheffield Chess Association will on set in motion a series of four communications from that town, the first being against the game in question being described as a "Match between the Clubs of Cardiff and Bristol," which is not the case, the latter club took no part in the contest. It appears, in fact, that the challenge of the Cardiff club was declined by the Bristol club in consequence of the latter having arranged to play a match with the Bath club, their own representative, it would have been well for the parties who said on the Bristol side to have waited in the first instance.

D.—Cambridge is not positively eligible for an assemblage of chess amateurs, being sadly eccentric from London, and possessing many features of attraction, that there can be little doubt the forthcoming meeting will be a success. Candidates for the honour must enter by the 31st inst.

Rook.—Mr. Staunton is at present resident in Manchester, and has established a column of chess in one of the leading papers of that busy city. He will no doubt be present at the Cambridge meeting.

W. S. PAYNE.—No; I admit of a second solution by 1. E from E 7th to K 8th (K), 2. Kt to Q 6th, mate. 1. Kt to K B 3rd (best) will not do.

BISHOPMILLAN.—It shall be corrected.

F. G. MARSHALL.—We cannot tell you where the Philadelphian Daily Evening Bulletin is filed in London. It ought to be taken in by all the chief chess clubs, and it will be well to urge the matter.

UNPUBLISHED LETTER OF SIR THOMAS GRESHAM.

THE subjoined epistle from the correspondence of this distinguished statesman and truly "Royal Merchant" preserved in the Public Record Office, we are enabled, by the kind permission of the Master of the Rolls, to print for the first time. It matters, at this time, but little to the memorable report in 1555 that the Queen, who in reality laboured under a dropsical affection, expected to become a mother. The extent under a dropsical affection, expected to become a mother. The extent to which this ridiculous delusion was fostered would be incredible were it not attested by official records of the time. "And now," says Holinshed, "time was brought to be right that this young master should come into the world, and that midwives, rockers, nurses, with the cradle and all, were prepared and in a readiness for the delivery, upon what cause or occasion it is uncertain, a certain rumour was blown in London of the prosperous deliverance of the Queen and the birth of the child, for the which bonfires were made, and banquets and processions made, not only in the city of London and in most other parts of the realm, but also in Antwerp there were shot off great peals of ordnance, the ships, and the mariners thereof were rewarded with an hundred pistolets or Italian crowns, by the Lady Bergen, who was there for the King." On the 3rd of May the Bishop of Norwich received "the solemn good newes of the Queene's Highnes' most hyefull deliverance of a noble Prince, whereupon, to laud God, Te Deum was solemply sung in the cathedral and other places of the city (of Norwich) with wonderfull joy and much gladnesse, and the like was done almost all the whole city and the country thereabouts." The parson of St. Anne within Aldersgate went so far, according to Stow, as "the part of this present here came news along the west to Bristow, and this country that the Queen's Majesty was brought a bed of a young Prince the last of April, which news continued here till the 4th day, and as third day, the Regent, being in this town of Antwerp, about seven of the clock at night, did cause the great ordnance to be shot off and men to understand that the news was true. FETE AT NORTON HALL, THE SEAT OF C. CAMMELL, ESQ.

FETE AT NORTON HALL, THE SEAT OF C. CAMMELL, ESQ.

THE traveller entering Sheffield by the Midland Railway most likely gets a mouthful of bitter smoke just before the train stops at the terminus from a small forest of chimneys and furnaces right and left of him. These are the Cyclops Steelworks, known well enough to railway engineers and companies, the property of C. Cammell, Esq., in many respects the most remarkable man in Sheffield. To us the true philosopher's stone seems unquestionably to be neither more nor less than good iron ore. Sheffield is one of England's laboratories, and the owner of Cyclops is a successful adept. That he once occupied a very different station in life Mr. Cammell makes no secret; that intelligence, decision of character, and indomitable perseverance have in a few years made a journeyman smith owner of 600 acres, and of Norton Hall, lord of the manor, Lay Rector of Norton, and master of the Cyclops Works, is scarcely a fact to conceal.

A fête of a very pleasant kind was held in the park of Norton Hall, on the 4th inst., to celebrate Mr. Cammell's fiftieth birthday. Every employé at the Cyclops, with his wife and children, to the number of nearly 3000, spent the day at his master's invitation in the grounds, by the gates of which Mr. Cammell used to stroll after a hard day's labour at the forge. Now owner of one of the most beautiful parks in Derbyshire, he was presented by his workmen with a massive gold plate candelabrum, manufactured by Messrs. Elkington, and valued at 500 guineas.

The workmen walked in procession from Sheffield; the women and children rode. Arriving at Norton, they were entertained by Mr. Cammell in a large marquee. A few of the items will show the hospitable ideas prevailing at Norton Hall. There were cut up at dinner 2 bullocks, 4 sheep, 28 lambs, 4 calves, 60 hams, 250 plum-puddings; 500 four-pound loaves, buns, cake, and wine; 64 thirty-six gallon barrels of ale; with ducks and fowls innumerable.

After dinner, cricketing, hurdle and foot racing (for prizes given by Mr. Cammell), archery, bands of music for dancers, racing in sacks, and every approved Sheffield pastime made the day quickly pass away, but not so soon will it pass away from the memories of the worthy "Sheffield blades."

Mr. G. Wilson, Mr. Cammell's manager, a man of the same stamp as his master, carried out to the full all the ample arrangements of the host, whose beaming face showed that he, at least, was enjoying the holiday. The presentation took place at four o'clock. An eloquent address was delivered, and a most gratifying reply received.

Norton Hall is situated on the slope and crown of a hill, with prospects of great beauty in every direction—the dales of Derbyshire sweeping away to the south; in the extreme distance there are Castleton and its caverns, and the High Peak district; Buxton lies yonder; Monsall and Millers Dales and Haddon just beyond. Hidden in blue smoke, Sheffield lies in the north-west, and beyond, again, the woods and moors of South Yorkshire; in the west, Beauchief Abbey and Ecclesall Wood.

The church, which stands in the park, has several ancient monuments, and was the burial-place of Sir Francis Chantrey. He was born in the adjoining village, and left bequests to the poor as long as his grave at Norton should be preserved. An old yew-tree and a broken cross stand in the churchyard near Chantrey's grave.

Norton Hall is a large Grecian pile, with an east front, decorated with copies in marble of statues by Canova. In the library and hall is a considerable art-collection, in part from Alton Towers, and partly brought from Italy by Mr. Cammell.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1046.—VOL. XXXVII.] SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1860. [WITH SUPPLEMENT AND COLOURED SUPPLEMENT] TENPENCE

THE TOUR OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

No one imagined that the progress of the Heir Apparent to the throne of England through our North American provinces was merely an experiment in reference to the loyalty of the people of those districts. Every certainty was felt that demonstrations of respect, attachment, and of enthusiasm would be abundant and continuous. There could be no doubt of the constant flow of formal but sincere addresses from every body of the people that could be constituted into an institution whence such instruments could issue with propriety and fitness. It was equally certain that exhibitions of personal appreciation of the presence of the eldest son of the Queen would be manifested in every way that crowds of every class, in all possible places and under every possible circumstance, could contrive to display their feelings. It was to be expected that every movement of the Prince would be accompanied by popular fêtes, and that every day the young nation on the other side of the Atlantic would make joyous holiday. In all these respects nothing has fallen short of anticipation; and the onward public and regular evidences of due consideration and estimation of an event which is remarkable for its novelty and its suggestiveness have fully come up to any standard which might have been formed. Governors and commanders-in-chief, legislators and municipalities, clergy and laity, in all corporate capacities which may belong to them, have, of course, been prominently assiduous in their greetings and their observance of the chartered forms of welcome to a personage so high as only to be one degree removed from a Monarch. Shouting, cheering, and applauding crowds of enthusiastic citizens have done and will do their honest, hearty, and genial part to the heart's content of the most exacting member of the Royal suite, and all has gone merrily and gladly.

It will, however, have been observed that there has been in the circumstances of the Prince's progress a kind of inner life and feature which is especially pleasing. We cannot read the accounts of the daily movements of his Royal Highness without perceiving that, apart from his public reception, he spreads to be thoroughly enjoying himself in private life. There is something peculiarly gratifying in the statements which show that he enters into the amusements and recreations of society with the zest of a high-spirited and accomplished young English gentleman. Emancipating himself from the trammels and the paraphernalia of Royalty, the Prince of Wales has thrown himself into the innocent gaiety of social life, with the fullest intention of making things agreeable to himself and pleasant to those who surround him; while, as far as we can learn, he has displayed infinite tact and excellent taste in those scenes more especially dedicated to recreation and amusement. Nothing can be more satisfactory than the description which we read of the Prince's doings in the various ballrooms which he has honoured with his presence; and his conduct on those festive occasions has clearly won for him the everlasting favour of that important section of the Canadian community, the ladies. Something has before now been whispered of a physical deficiency which tended to render his Royal Highness somewhat graver and less active in his habits and tastes than is usually found in young men of his age in this country. After reading the accounts of his proceedings in North America, no one is likely to question his soundness or decay to him to the possession of those good spirits and that animation and capability of enjoyment which are inseparable from healthy, happy, and care-free youth.

We learn that as the Prince proceeds on his prescribed route Royal state is more and more gradually laid aside, so long as he is merely travelling. In this respect he occupies the position of a high-bred gentleman of rank, and nothing more, and for all practical purposes while in motion he almost assumes that incognito which, as Lord Renfrew, he will maintain during his progress through the United States. It is not merely by notice that this visit of the Royal Highness seems to excite considerable interest beyond the border of our North American colonies, and everything betokens for him a hearty and even an enthusiastic welcome among the Republican citizens of a state which every day seems more anxious to recognise a monarchical origin and connection in the land in which it is, and which prides itself still as being essentially Anglo-Saxon. The good taste and tact which has ordained that the representative of Old-World monarchy should merge his factitious rank in the simple character of an English gentleman in a country which does not acknowledge, but still respects, hereditary sovereignty, cannot but be heartily appreciated, and we very much doubt whether our brethren in the United States will not show to a European Prince that Republican institutions are quite consistent with national splendour and magnificence.

From every point of view, the republic—for in many respects it is entitled to that designation—of the immediate heir to the British crown is calculated to be beneficial. To our North American provinces it will give an opportunity of recognising limited monarchy as a principle and an institution which finds its support in the very centre of free, constitutional government; to the United States it will offer a direct pledge for the existence of those feelings of sympathy and mutual respect and esteem between the two nations which, we believe, were never more thoroughly and generally entertained as at the present moment; while to the Prince himself it will afford excellent scope for gathering experience of men and things under circumstances which have never been before within the reach of the legitimate successor to the throne of England; and it would be strange, indeed, if his Royal Highness returned home without having made a rapid and a gainful stride towards that manhood on the verge of which he stands. Every way the matter is subject for congratulation; and the worthy inhabitants of those transatlantic territories may depend upon it that the English people will be quite as appreciative, and will not be one jot more forgot, the representative and suggestive character which their cordial, earnest, and heart-whole reception of the Prince of Wales has assumed in the minds of their brethren in the old country.

The bureau of Napoleon I. recently advertised for sale, was sold in Paris on Saturday to M. Rieuse, a furniture-dealer.

The arrival of the Emperor of Russia at Warsaw is fixed for the forty-part of August. The Emperor will stop at Skierniewice to inaugurate the railway from that place to St. Petersburg.

An Irish servant girl, named Jane M'Coen, residing in Boston, Massachusetts, recently transmitted to Ireland the sum of £40, the result of six years' incessant toil, as payment of her deceased father's liabilities.

The Turkish Government have again authorised the Government to pay £2700 to the owners of the British sloop Herald, unjustly seized whilst trading with the Circassian coast.

Lola Montes has recovered sufficiently from her severe attack of paralysis to be removed to Astoria. She is as yet scarcely able to lift her head, and keeps herself in bed for the greater part of the day.

According to accounts received at St. Petersburg the insurrection in the Caucasus has been completely put down, and the villages occupied by the rebels have been destroyed.

Intelligence has been received from Portugal announcing the marriage of the Infante Don Augusto, youngest sister of the King of Portugal with the Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, brother of the deceased prince consort of Portugal, and son of the President of the Prussian Ministers. The Princess Augusta was born on February 4, 1835, and was therefore in her twenty-fifth year.

The Nouvelliste of Rouen says that a very curious coin was found at Carville, near Rouen, on Tuesday week, being a gold piece struck in 1418, when Henry V., after the battle of Agincourt, was master of the greater part of France on his marriage with Catherine, daughter of Charles VI.; it bears the following inscription, which is quite new:—"Henry, par la grace de Dieu, roi d'Angleterre et de France."

The merchants of Frankfort are at present signing a declaration by which they denounce public gambling-houses, and bind themselves to dismiss any of their clerks who may play therein; also not to employ any they may find have been discharged for that offence. The house which they have adopted for its measure is that a railway is to be opened which will place Homburg within an hour's distance of Frankfort.

EXTRAORDINARY INSURANCE FRAUD.—Accounts from Valparaiso give details of an extraordinary insurance fraud. A merchant pretended to be engaged in buying up gold doubloons for shipment on board a vessel he had lately purchased. He made up boxes purporting to contain £20,000, but which, instead, were filled with stones; while as the same time he extracted £25,000 from other boxes which had been sent on board as freight. He accompanied the vessel himself, and after a certain period was arrived that she had foundered at sea, and that he had been saved. He at once claimed from the underwriters, and two insurance companies at Valparaiso paid their policies, and others in New York and Lima have been referred to settle without further explanation. The result has been that they have unravelled the whole affair, the agent of the delinquent having made a full confession.

FRANCE.

The Emperor and Empress left on Thursday on a visit to the new departments of Savoy and Nice. Marshal Vaillant is intrusted with the care of the Imperial Prince during the absence of their Majesties. The Marshal will also sit at the Council of Ministers. A squadron of lancers will escort their Majesties to Algiers. The Foudre is about to proceed to Tunis to convey the Bey from that place to Algiers, where he will remain under the stay of the Emperor and Empress.

The Moniteur publishes a decree abolishing the duties on emolluire. Another decree abolishes the compensation duties established by a decree of February last, on cashiers made of cloth and trimmings in silk, velvet, or gold lace. Another decree reduces the duties on chocolate liqueurs to 6f. 25c. per hectolitre.

Thursday's Moniteur publishes a decree reducing the navigation dues on the canals of France. The reduced scale to come into operation on September 1, 1860.

SPAIN.

The great Powers have, it is stated, agreed to discontinue all further negotiations for increasing Spain in the manner of the great Powers.

It is announced that the Court, after returning to Madrid on September 3, will start for Barcelona on the 10th, unless any extraordinary circumstance should occur to prevent her Majesty from doing so." It is supposed that this saving clause alludes to the eventuality of the fall of Franco de Rocha, which, once the Liberals, who compose the great majority of the population of Madrid, might possibly take advantage of the absence of the Court to testify their joy in a somewhat too exuberant manner.

M. Ribero, the editor of the Discusion, has been wounded in a duel with the Duke de Rivas, the latter having accused the Duke himself for reporting that he had bastinadoed a soldier. The Colonel has received three challenges arising out of the same affair, but it is not thought that there will be any more fighting about it. M. Ribero's wound—a pistol-shot in the abdomen—is not dangerous.

SARDINIA.

Baron Winspeare has been appointed Neapolitan Minister at Turin.

The official Gazette of Turin publishes a circular addressed by the Minister of the Interior to the Governors and Intendants-General in reference to the levy of volunteers to join the national army:—

"The Piedmontese Government," says a communication from Turin, "has ordered the formation of ten camps of instruction, divided into six groups:—1st. A camp on the right bank of the Upper Ticino, north of Novara; two camps. 2nd. Three camps on the mountains of Lombardy, to the north of Milan, towards the Mincio, and towards Cremona; in all, three divisions. 3rd. Two camps in the environs of Parma and Modena, and between Bagnacallo; three divisions. 4th. A camp near Ferrara; two divisions. 5th. The Italian volunteers, who will assemble in Tuscany, opposite Mantua; two divisions. 6th. A Tuscan camp, a detached corps, manœuvring at eight kilometres (five miles), from Florence.

THE PAPAL STATES.

The fête of the Assumption, on the 15th inst., passed off in tranquillity.

The Pope is said to have augmented his motley army by the engagement of 1000 men for the consolidation of the Austrian Duke of Modena, and who have been quartered in Ventia since their master's expulsion from his duchy. Disturbances connected with the enlistment have been apprehended.

General Lamoricière has dismissed all the clerks at the Spoleto telegraph office for holding treasonable correspondence with Venice, has confided the service to a Jesuit from the Loretto College, who he thinks will keep his secrets better.

AUSTRIA.

The Committee of twenty-one members of the Reichsrath, acknowledging the justice of the reasons adduced in the memorandum of the Archduke Rainer, has resolved to recommend that the Austrian Ministry be reconstituted.

Proposed by the Minister of Finance, has unanimously decided that the marine budget may be increased by 1,900,000 florins.

The Council of the Empire has adopted, that the Austrian Ministers have accepted, the scheme demanded by the Hungarian members of the Council of the Empire for the reorganisation of the Austrian empire. The national Hungarian fête has passed off with perfect order, in consequence of the wise measure adopted by the Archduke Albert, intrust the maintenance of public order altogether to the municipality of Pesth, whose members, on this condition, undertook to guarantee the tranquillity of the town. The Prince Primate, who has resigned altogether on the national side, was loudly cheered by the people while leaving the religious procession, in which he officiated pontifically.

A letter in the Debats says:—"I need not tell you of the attitude of Austria; it is as threatening as it can be and be at peace, i.e., not at actual war. Verona is constantly reinforced. The garrison, to a force of 18,000 inhabitants, there is a garrison of 14,000 soldiers. There are soldiers in the smallest villages."

SYRIA.

Advices from Damascus, transmitted by way of Constantinople, state that Fuad Pacha was vigorously engaged in the task of restoring tranquillity. Numerous arrests had been made of the Druse chiefs and Mussulmans which have filled Syria with bloodshed. He had moved a large body of troops towards Lebanon, and had threatened to waste the Druse districts with fire and sword if they did not bring their arms to surrender within two days. Twenty of them had already been captured, and among these was the Druse Emir Said Jumblat. Besides, about 1000 camel-loads of plunder had been recovered.

A letter from Alexandria of the 6th states that the Viceroy of Egypt was sending 5000 men to the Christian refugees and their families, and had offered them concessions of land in case they would establish themselves in Egypt.

They had left Damascus on Thursday at noon—a caravan composed chiefly of women and children, with a few old men—numbering in all 1400 souls, under the Turkish authorities had provided cattle for the conveyance of 1500 persons, but many of the refugees had to go on foot, carrying their own or friends. Parched with thirst, not half fed, unwashed, with clothes unchanged for nearly a fortnight, covered with dust, and covered with flies, they had hitherto, under heavens glowing like brass, from the city, which, if it be the most ancient, still beautiful of all the cities of the earth, had been a scene of horror—of widows and orphans, whose husbands, fathers, and brethren had all been slain before their eyes with circumstances of the most revolting barbarity—of pillage and devine, and whose most comely maidens had been sold to gratify the brutal lust of fiend-like men. Of the 1400 who started on Thursday, 400 had already had died on the journey, and one was taken in labour. Babes might be seen clinging to dead mothers, and mothers were seen to lay their children down to dirty, so disfigured by noses, on which flies settled continually, as to be unrecognisable. Of the 1000 who arrived yesterday evening, not more than sank down exhausted, heedless of the crowd that pressed upon them, looking like so many corpses, and many of them actually mistaken for such by their kindred to take the water for which they famished, or of crawling to the shelter provided for them by the authorities at Ras-el-Metn, near Khana. The streets leading from the Damascus road were thronged with mules, stumbling horses, and asses, all huddled together, and increasing the confusion of the fugitives all the more painful.

THE UNITED STATES.

A reported resignation of Secretary Cass was without foundation.

Congressional and other elections were being held in several of the States. At Louisville the shock was slight. No damage was done.

The President visited the Great Eastern on the 8th inst. The excitement on board the ship was very great. Her Majesty's steamer Styx and two pleasure-trips she has taken to Cape May and Annapolis have notwithstanding certain deficiencies in the border, &c., confirmed the previous favourable impressing her. Her speed and other seagoing qualities give much satisfaction.

THE OPERATIONS IN SICILY AND NAPLES.

LANDING OF GARIBALDI IN CALABRIA.

The war on the main land has begun. Several expeditions on a minor scale had been sent from Sicily to the opposite coast, but whether set on foot simply to baffle and confuse the foe, or put out as feelers, or intended as advanced guards to clear the route by which Garibaldi would pour in the main body of his troops, was not clear, As read by the light of after events, the latter seems to have been their purpose. The landing of Garibaldi himself on the coast of Calabria, according to the telegrams, took place at the very spot for which its preparations were visibly made—namely, Bagnara. A few miles north of the foot of Scylla, and in easy reach from Faro, on the Sicilian coast, which, according to another telegram, the landing was effected at Melito, a village about fifteen miles to the southward of Reggio. This discrepancy, probably, arises from the fact that Garibaldi's troops landed in separate bodies, so that both accounts may be correct. Detachments had been disembarked before at various points of the coast, and it would not be astonished at hearing that the Sicilian dictator has at once been joined by insurgent forces from Calabria strong enough to enable him to attack Reggio. The headquarters of the opposing Neapolitan army corps. A Provisional Calabrian Government has already been formed, and has commenced operations in a neighbouring town. The division of Cosenz, which set out before from Taormina, further south, is probably that force which was repulsed in the despatches from Faro, to have landed at Capodellarme, about as much south of Reggio as Bagnara is situated north of it. As Bagnara Garibaldi had to run the risk of being taken between the two hostile points—namely, that of the occupation of Reggio and that of the Neapolitan troops in quarters at Palma. The reported attack upon Reggio has, however, to show that he must have known how, with his accustomed rapidity, he had cut the tables upon his adversaries; and it is now, with the landing effected at Capodellarme, the garrison of Reggio which has every attempt made from it, and will probably have soon to surrender.

Another attempt, made three days before at Naples itself, and with which the Times reported visit to Cagliari probably stood in connection, was not equally successful. The telegram which has been received under date of the 18th, from Naples, by the Moniteur, says that 2500 men with arms, and 200 tents, had already been gradually disembarked at Naples, where, consequently, all naval defence must have come to an end, but that the Royal Guard had compelled them to re-embark. This report evidently wants further elucidation, for in the shape in which it is put it is not at all easily or easily answered. This force was not to take Naples by surprise, but only to assist, in case of an insurrection, in the erection of barricades and the like, says the despatch.

The following telegrams relating to the landing of Garibaldi on the Calabrian coast we have received from St. Michael's:—

NAPLES, August 21 (vit Florence).—News has been received here of the landing of 2000 Garibaldians in Calabria, who joined the insurgents and attacked Reggio. This caused the 100 Sicilian vessels detained Garibaldi and his army at Bagnara. The telegraph lines between Palmi and Reggio are cut. A provisional Government has been established at Palmarola. The elections have been adjourned until the end of September. The Parliament is to be summoned for the 30th inst.

MESSINA, August 19, 6 p.m.—Garibaldi, with 3800 men, has landed at Melito, on the Calabrian coast, from Reggio. A general attack is imminent.

REGGIO, August 21.—A report is current here that Garibaldi, with 6000 men, has landed at Capo delle Armi, in Calabria.

TURIN, Aug. 20.—Count Cavour, in a letter of to-day contains the following despatch from Naples, dated yesterday evening :—"3000 Garibaldians have disembarked on the Neapolitan coast. Cosenza is in revolt. The steamer Garibaldi has taken Reggio. The Neapolitan forces are concentrated at Monteleone."

MESSINA, Aug. 19 (vii Marseilles).—The city has been illuminated in honour of the departure of Garibaldi and his household. Garibaldi, on his return from Capri, met and went on board an English vessel. On his arrival at the port he found a number of Englishmen waiting on board the steamer and fifteen rifled cannon. He departed again without landing, accompanied by several Bluejackets and Garibaldians. Cosenza is expected to-day to-day for another point of the mainland. A Garibaldian vessel was run aground on the Neapolitan coast, in order to land volunteers. The Garibaldians, however, as was the case at the first landing of Garibaldians at Marsala, fired on the vessels that came to their assistance.

Since our last publication, though of a date prior to the above, the following telegrams have been received :—

NAPLES, August 15 (vii Turin).—1000 Garibaldians have disembarked in Calabria, and joined the insurgents. They afterwards withdrew to Aspromonte.

GENOA, August 18.—News received from Naples states that Colonel Cosenz, with seven volunteers, had quitted Taormina and taken the direction of the mainland.

Letters from special correspondents enable us to give clearer as well as fuller details of the landing of the first corps of Garibaldians at Faro. Thus, in relation to the expedition on the 8th instant, under Major Missori—of which the Times and Post gave information—a letter elsewhere by our Special Artist and Correspond ent in Sicily—the correspondent of the Daily News writes as follows from Faro (near Messina) on the 9th inst. :—

PASSAGE OF THE STRAITS BY MAJOR MISSORI.

There they are on the main land, the men whose hearts of sorrow ant despair the national flag is hoisted again upon the misty tops of the Calabrian mountains. Yesterday (the 8th inst.) as the sun was setting a south-west wind was driving dense clouds towards the Calabrian coasts. A dark night was favourable to the movements of the troops to the Italian coast, as long meditated by the Italian hero of our times. The rays of the rising moon were not able to pierce the dense vapours of the atmosphere. The hour of land which skirts the Sicilian gulf was wrapped in a dense veil of fog. At eight o'clock the steamer Torino, the vessel which the City of Aberdeen had left orders to Major Missori—the noble fellow to whom Garibaldi is indebted for his life, which twenty thousand ducats would not have bought—was lost at Melazzo. Ten men were asked to volunteer out of each company of one hundred men, and the gallant Carabineri of Genoa, the regular police, and twenty of the engineer battalion and of the artillery were, besides, asked for. The men were divided into companies, English and French volunteers. The party on which thus devolved the honour of leading the way to the mainland was under the orders of Captain Orsini and 300 men. Major Missori was the officer in command, and had under his orders Majors Salomone and Malenchini, and Captain Orsini. The men were told off, all the men were on board fishing-boats and ready to sail. But here an unanticipated difficulty arose. Many of the officers of the brigade, the officers who were not of the envied number made most earnest requests to their officers to be allowed to share in the glory and perilous task. The order was strong right to witness the grief of those who had been left behind, and to hear their bitter lamentations at their fate. Many companies, soon relieved, discontent of duty was uppermost in their hearts. Half-past nine was passing from the bell-tower of the Annunziata, when the Christian cry, "Viva Maria!" resounded amidst the surrounding darkness of the night. The moment was really solemn and impressive. Three hundred young men—the flower of Italy—were starting on the most audacious and dangerous enterprise of this wonderful campaign. Long had the preparations for the expedition been carried on with hundreds of guns, and its narrow sea is swarming with Neapolitan men-of-war. The Bourbon fleet was cruising in the middle of the straits, and it was known here that it had been directed by Garibaldi to surprise and storm the forts of Cavalla, Vibo, Pizzo, Amantea, and Paola, and possess a rocky hillock which skirts the coast. A signal had been agreed upon to inform Garibaldi of the success of the landing. I will not attempt to describe the anxious expectation of that long, long hour. Ten thousand men were waiting there to know the fate of their brethren who had volunteered to march in the faint light appeared along the opposite shore. God be praised, the expedition had landed! The signal was given. The vessel had successfully escaped from the rattle of musketry was brought to this shore through the fresh breath of the sea. A few minutes after all was silent and the silence was of mystery again. In less than an hour, however, a messenger arrived from Major Missori, announcing the successful landing of our friends, and explained the cause of the firing. The expedition was nearly touching the opposite shore, when one of the boats in which the corps had crossed the straits capsized from it, and went towards Villa San Giovanni. In that boat was the Neapolitan officer who had commanded the expedition. He, as they did not know the coast, and had not been made acquainted with Garibaldi's orders to Missori, they took him to be a Neapolitan officer. Their first duty was to dark the sentries of the battery saw the boat approach and gave the alarm, speedily followed by a discharge of musketry and a cannon-shot. Two men were wounded, but this was not the worst, for they were obliged to sail back as quickly as possible. By the time this unfortunate accident happened Major Missori had proceeded with his men on the road towards Forte del Cavallo. But suddenly hearing the report of a gun and the rattling of musketry, and not being able to explain it, he thought that the surprise of the garrison of Forte del Cavallo had been unsuccessful. Under this impression, Major Missori therefore took the path of the mountains.

The Neapolitan troops were received in Sicily pf the forlorn hope on the other side. They were all safe at St. Angelo in the mountains, and had been already joined by a number of Calabrese insurgents.

Missori's further proceedings are subsequently referred to. After having marched the whole of the night Major Missori met a column of Neapolitan troops, who seemed disposed to dispute his passage. The fight was hard and long on both sides, but at last the Neapolitans gave way. Major Missori had six wounded, and lost another, who fell into the hands of the Neapolitans. When the Austrian troops left Missori was allowed to march with his men on Ayprocuste, a small village which, as its name indicates, stands on the top of a mountain. Later accounts state that Missori's force had already swollen to 1500 men.

The Turin correspondent writes from Faro on the 13th inst., as follows:—

There is no doubt the insurrection in the southern part of Calabria is gaining ground every day. The little resistance which has been met with is an exciting not, and not only keeps in ground, but thinks itself in sufficient force to molest the Royal troops in their march. Last night again, long after Cialdini's departure, we were awakened by heavy musketry firing on the very same spot where the firing took place on the night before—that is, about five miles from the sea, the first cluster of houses, and the fort on the Punta di Pezzo. For about ten minutes the firing was very heavy indeed, and then ceased, only to break out in the gun-boats, and two by the fort. As soon as the guns opened the anxiety became extreme, and everything was soon quiet again. I can only explain Garibaldi having another of those demonstrations which those who are with him think the very best turn. The effect of this appears to be to terrify the inhabitants of the side. There are continual movements and counter movements of Neapolitan troops and insurgents. They have fatigued and harassed an extraordinary sentiency. The force of insurgents is said to have kept their position in and already in the mountains, and as they were for the last few days in doubt about the Faro and at Messina just as they were for the last few days in doubt about the Faro and at Messina just as they were for the last few days in doubt about the Faro and at Messina just

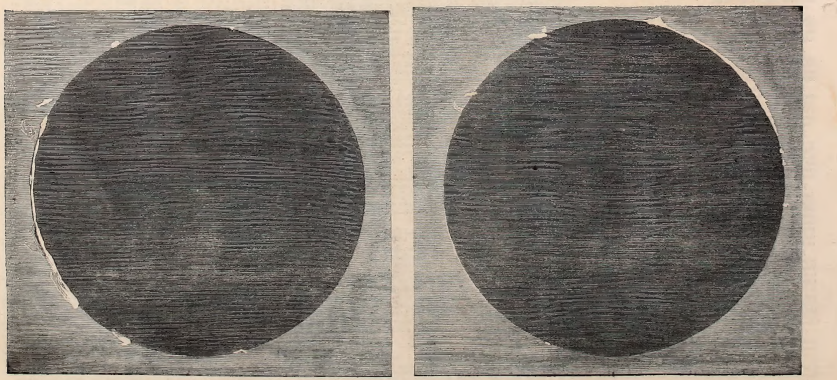
LITERATURE.

THE EARLY LIFE OF LOUIS NAPOLEON, COLLECTED FROM AUTHENTIC RECORDS. Bosworth and Harrison.

It is stated by the writer of this work—an Englishwoman—that some time ago, when visiting England, she was astonished at the little real knowledge possessed by her countrymen of the early life and antecedents of the man now seated on the throne of France—a knowledge calculated to throw much light on what now appears mysterious in his character, and to remove the distrust with which he has hitherto been regarded. She therefore took advantage of her residence in France to collect, from authentic sources, such incidents of the strange and eventful career of Louis Napoleon as she thinks cannot fail to be interesting to the intelligent reader. So far we suppose most persons will be ready to go along with the author. A variety of circumstances render it very desirable that Englishmen should form a just estimate of a ruler who exercises so great an influence in Europe, and who from time to time moves the mind and heart of England in a manner which is at once considerable and perplexing. To what extent the tone, almost exclusively of panegyric, which has been adopted in a volume professing to give a true notion of its subject is calculated to supply an acknowledged deficiency we are not prepared to say. Something about the work gives one the idea that it is a translation from the French; but, be that as it may, nothing can be more decided than the partisanship exhibited, and the impression which it leaves is certainly not that the object which it is stated was had in view has been attained. Of course there is sufficiency of anecdote running through the memoir, many of which are not new. We do not, however, remember to have seen the following, which will, perhaps, as well as anything, illustrate the tone and style of the book:—



"Like all persons of lively imagination—like her mother, the Empress Josephine, and even the great Napoleon himself—Queen Hortense's mind was slightly tinctured with superstition. One day, in either 1834 or 1835, when she was residing at Arenenberg, the conversation turned on mesmerism, on those prodigies of divination before which human reason recoils in affright and astonishment, although their authenticity is, in some cases at least, undoubted. The Queen was anxious to put it to the test—to see if any hand possessed the power of raising before her that mysterious curtain that veils the future from our eyes. Dr. Bailly, who happened that day to be on a visit to the château, chose for his subject a negress, named Malvina, who was in the service of the illustrious exile. He mesmerised her, and placed her in communication with the Queen, who demanded if she could then see her son—the Prince being that day at the camp of Thun. On receiving a reply in the affirmative, she next inquired what he was then doing and about to do? 'I see him,' replied Malvina, 'surrounded by soldiers, who crowd round him, shouting and brandishing their sabres.' 'Is it in Switzerland?' 'No; but the people speak German.' 'What more do you see?' 'Alas! all is over—he is taken prisoner.' 'And whither are they conducting him?' 'To America.' 'Shall I follow him there?' 'No; illness will prevent you doing so.' 'And what then—can you see nothing more?' 'Heavens! what do I behold?' suddenly resumed Malvina, as though dazzled by a vivid burst of light; 'he is here all-powerful; the sovereign of a great nation!' 'Of what nation?' exclaimed the Queen. 'Of the French?' 'Yes,' replied Malvina; 'he is in France.' The negress was not mistaken in her first prediction. Two months afterwards the Prince went to Strasbourg, was there taken prisoner and sent to America, whither the Queen, having been taken ill, was unable to accompany him. As to the second prophecy, our readers can judge for themselves how far it has been accomplished."

ON THE NATURE AND TREATMENT OF THE DISEASES OF THE HEART By JAMES WARDROP, M.D., &c. Second Edition. W. Tinsley.

We beg to call the attention of the medical profession to a new and revised edition of Dr. Wardrop's valuable and excellent book on diseases of the heart. The subject-matter of its pages, we need scarcely add, is one of the deepest importance in the practice of the healing art, and that man is a benefactor to his race whose labours tend to the improvement in diagnosis and treatment of a class of diseases so often embarrassing and always a source of deep anxiety to the medical practitioner. Our author tells us that, after having devoted many years to the collection of materials for his book, he finds the subject so comprehensive that he has far from exhausted it in a volume of upwards of 650 pages. Nevertheless, what he has collected and condensed will be found of great value, and may be depended upon, as proceeding from an intelligent, clever, practical physician. The author has supplied what was an important omission in the former edition of his book—a copious index.

TOURISTS' GUIDES.

The metropolitan voyagers of every class are probably now let loose, so far as their personal arrangements are concerned, and the only obstacles to tours are climatic. Properly considered with the season, a number of guide-books have been just published. The first on which we lay our hand is entitled "How We Saw Belgium, the Rhine, the Meuse, and Paris in Fifteen Days," by Thomas William Newton (Shephard and Co.). The contents of this little volume were originally contributed to a private magazine written by persons employed in her Majesty's Printing-office. Its object is not to open a new path of travel, but to carry the reader along a track old and familiar, yet of undying and inexhaustible interest; to point out how a long journey may be performed in a very short space of time without omitting any prominent object of interest; and to record impressions made on the mind while passing through scenes remarkable for picturesque beauty, and inseparably blended with history, literature, and art. It is admirably adapted for the use of a large class who, anxious to make the most of a brief respite from the business and cares of life, would be glad to know how much of the continent of Europe, its landscapes, cities, cathedrals, pictures, and battle-grounds, may be glanced at with pleasure and profit by a slight personal exertion and a small amount of forethought, in a fifteen days' absence from London. Messrs. Longman have issued a series of practical travelling guides, comprehending Through Routes and a General Continental Guide, A Practical Guide to Paris, another to Italy, and one to Switzerland, the purpose being to show tourists how to see all that ought to be seen in the shortest period and at the least expense. The necessary information is put in a well-arranged form, and the books contain the introductory routes from London, and every possible advice relating to hotels, ports, steamers, tariffs, railways, &c., as well as more minute statements in reference to the right places where any article for use or ornament may be obtained (ladies' bonnets are among the items indicated), and a moderate and simple vocabulary for the assistance of insular unacquaintance with Continental languages. There are also brief notes on architecture, painting, public works, scenery, and natural history; and, in short, all that is really essential is indicated, and all that is irrelevant is excluded. When it is stated that this is the fifth edition of the books in question a sufficient guarantee for their usefulness is given.

To those who think that their own country has sufficient charms and sufficient novelty for travellers we have to present A Guide to the Coasts of Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk, with Descriptions of Scenery, Historical, Legendary, and Archæological, by Mackenzie E. C. Walcot, M.A., of Exeter College, Oxford (Stanford). This is a guide with which a tourist who is in no hurry, and wishes to dwell on the objects of interest in the places designated, will find invaluable. Nelson's Handbook to Scotland for Tourists, by the Rev. John M. Wilson (Nelson and Sons), is a volume. It contains an introductory "General View of Scotland," which is a history, topographical, civil, agricultural, manufacturing, religious, and natural, in little; the rest is a gazetteer, composed in a spirit almost literary; and the book, although practically useful for the moment, is adapted for all time. A new edition of Black's Tourist and Angler's Guide to Moffat and its Vicinity, including the Grey Mare's Tail, Loch Skene, and St. Mary's Loch, has brought the account of this Scottish spa down to the period of publication, and contains, besides the historical and traditionary facts relating to the district, the results of analyses of the mineral waters, contributed by Dr. Murray Thomson, of Edinburgh. The idea of a visit to this specialty of the Vale of Annan is decidedly enticing.

A Guide through North Wales, by William Cathrall (Stanford), includes Anglesea, Carnarvonshire, Denbighshire, Flintshire, Merionethshire, and Montgomeryshire, with the adjacent borders, completing the basin of the River Dee and the upper basin of the Severn, as far as Shrewsbury, and is designed to accompany the Ordnance maps. A systematic arrangement of the routes is introduced upon a scientific basis, enabling the tourist to connect the scenery of the country with its natural structure, to which end a notice of the geology of the country, by A. C. Ramsay, Esq., local director of the Geological Survey of Great Britain, materially contributes.

THE IMPERIAL HEAD-QUARTERS AT THE CAMP OF CHALONS.

OUR last Number contained three Illustrations of the Camp at Châlons, and another, which we now give, completes the series. The first point of attraction to visitors to the Camp is that part of it known as the Quartier Impérial, or Imperial Head-quarters. It is situated about a mile from the village of Grand-Mourmelon, and comprises a series of light constructions and chalets gracefully arranged. The principal pavilion, in the centre, is the habitation of the Emperor; that on the right in our Illustration is the Imperial salle-à-manger. The pavilion on the left is the Council Chamber, immediately after which comes the dwelling of the Marshal commanding the troops, at present Marshal M'Mahon. The two smaller pavilions behind that constructed for the Emperor are for the Imperial staff officers. In the background there are other less pretentious buildings for the accommodation of the subordinate attendants and for the service. When his Majesty sojourns at the camp the Quartier Impérial is lighted by lamps. At the extremity of the line forming the front of the head-quarters there is an altar upon which Divine service is regularly performed every Sunday morning at nine o'clock in presence of all the troops in full campaign costume and accoutrements. It is on the open ground between these pavilions and the village that the grand manœuvres usually take place. Our Engraving of the Head-quarters represents also a defile of troops under the command of the Duke of Magenta.

GROUSE-SHOOTING.

IT was generally believed this year that the festival of St. Grouse would prove a mere Barnecicle repast, and hence not a few sportsmen have been agreeably disappointed. On the whole, the covers of the heather are likely to have a much better time of it than the partridge-shooters, who scarcely meet with anything but birds, by twos and threes, as they walk over their farms. The difficulty of hatching was very evident in the coveys on the Sheffield moors, which, although strong on the wing, showed a very great difference both in size and condition. Still the young lords were pretty numerous, and several bags on the 12th averaged above eighteen brace. That of the Prince Consort and Sir George Grey and suite, in the Mast of Monaltrie, was a lively Reveuse, and included 120 brace, beside several hares. The centose and Maltese mopers furnished no great reason for complaint. Throughout the day the Cumberland moors are favourable, and one of the members for the county, with six guns to help him, bagged 60 brace near Gilsland before the twelve-o'clock halt was called sounded by the gentleman, on an adjacent moor, shot 29 brace and two snipes in the same space. Another bag of 27½ brace was made in the same neighbourhood on the opening day. The Northumberland moors were generally very bare of grouse, but, as on the Scottish ones, there was a tolerable supply of black game. In the Cheff and Welsh districts the supply of both was good. In Ayrshire we hear of one bag of 41 brace, which is eight brace above its owner's number last year; and in Banffshire the moors are reported to be thin for the birds are much wilder than usual. After the perpetual practice they have had with pigeon this season at Hornsey-wood House, the shots at the latter ought to be steadier than ever. In fact, such is the perfection to which shooting is brought, that Lord Lonsdale a noble Lord killed the greater number of his grouse with ball; and of course all rifle volunteers with a certificate are in duty bound to follow his example, and make the terrible known among the stubbles (whenever we see any) their choicest training-ground for Wimbledon.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1859.

THE days of Parliament are actually numbered at last, and real work is, as Carlyle calls it, getting itself done at a pace which may yet make the birds tremble. The prospect of another collision between the two Houses has been quietly nipped in the bud by the Lords' consent to consider the bone of contention as both a money bill and urgent, and to read the bill, not, however, without some discussion from the two noble Lords who stood in the forefront of the original opposition, and which may at some future time make it convenient to define what a money bill really is.

The effort to do something with that considerable collection of edifices more or less stately, more or less obstructive, and more or less dirty, which once a week inclose for a couple of hours or so a reverend gentleman, a churchwarden or two, a few nearly invisible neighbouring tradesmen, and a beadle, and which are known as the City churches, has occupied an amount of time and attention, and elicited an amount of discussion, which not only pays a just tribute to the importance of the many questions involved, but raises an irresistible suspicion that five-sixths of the most clamorous talkers on the subject have hardly given themselves time to think it out. The great question seems to have been almost blinked—Why do the churches stand empty? Sir Morton Peto declares his ability to "fill them to-morrow." The nave of St. Paul's is crammed every evening a people's service is announced. Meanwhile, Lord Derby has been inaugurating the usual ceremonial connected with the erection of the burial-ground and new man's church at Kirkdale, with a good, telling speech about national progress and education, ragged schools, and many other topics, and which contains some pointed remarks on this subject well worth perusal. The "enormous inclosures" come in for no small share of obloquy, and, to the wonder of many blinked—Why is the churches stand empty? Sir Morton Peto declares his ability to "fill them to-morrow." The "enormous inclosures" come in for no small share of obloquy, and, to the wonder of many technical, imaginary, and real; and, as Mr. Hubbard has succeeded in interposing a couple of months' delay and an appeal to Parliament before any action can be taken, we are likely to hear more—a great deal more—of it.

The Prince of Wales's progress continues to furnish a string of incidents which, if they call up many an involuntary smile, serve strikingly to illustrate the proverbially hearty, sterling loyalty of our colonists. It is true the enormous amount of cheering which has generally greeted his Royal Highness's appearance sustained a singular contrast in the awe-abused silence of the good folks at St. John; but it may be fairly doubted whether this significant stillness, as well as the steady wondering stare of the "beautiful little children" collected on the occasion, and the silent inundation of bouquets and flowers were not to the full as expressive as the cheering, the waving of little flags, and the handbell-ringing, which formed the running accompaniment to the continuation of his route to Fredericton, or as the intense wrath exhibited by the Carleton people when they were last driven out. But the Prince could not visit them—a rage only equalled in intensity by the furious enthusiasm with which the reversal of the unwelcome decision was greeted.

It has been happily said that Mr. Reuter's telegrams have much to answer for. They certainly succeed in involving the Dictator's memory in a sort of sepia-like cloud of obscurity, and this result is most probably in exact accordance with the General's wishes. The general result of the varying information so far received, but which may receive any amount of further variation whilst these lines are passing through the press, amounts to an assertion that Garibaldi's force in Calabria, the commencement of the Royal family's flight, and the packing of the young King's own carpet-bag in the shape of a schooner well stored with ducats, which might by possibility arrive at a different destination from that originally intended.

Agriculturist of a quiet and phlegmatic turn are solemnly announcing their resolution to give up the weather in disgust, to cease from all speculation, and provide for the worst. It is no laughing matter, in all seriousness, for them, or for the country generally, though there appears to be but little harm done yet—but one week more of the present weather will be ruinous, and without reasonable cause. Every regiment at home now takes its turn of camp service yearly, and spends some months in huts and some weeks under canvas. The object of course is besides manœuvring bodies of troops together, to inure them to the sort of life they may be called on to lead in campaigning. But there is such a thing as carrying good projects too far. The ostrich died on tenpenny nails; and the reports from the Curragh reveal a state of things which bids fair to bring about a similar catastrophe among some of the most valuable of her Majesty's troops. It appears that in this hydropathic establishment men get washed out of their huts not unfrequently; lakes form themselves during the night, in which horses are patiently standing up to their bellies in water in the morning; benevolent officers charter a hut for the express purpose of a dry place for their men; and, in general, a tendency to an amphibious state of things seems observable. This is hard upon men and horses who are expected to be in a constant state of rude and ready health. Can routine manage nothing better? A battalion of Guards was started by routine for the Aldershot Camp one drenching morning this summer. Humanity dispatched a telegram to recommend their waiting a few hours for a lull in the weather; but routine contrived to bring the telegram to town half an hour or so after the well-moistened troops had left. Surely, in such a country and age as this, no system has a right to challenge respect which cannot provide for a rainy day.

The history of a gun may form an attractive title for a catchpenny morsel of questionable literature, but it will henceforth be pregnant with more than its significance for our volunteers, or, at any rate, for so many of them as have selected what may after all turn out to be the most subordinate useful department of this national defence. In some measure, the concluding part of the evidence on the Dover inquest was, on authority, anticipated by us last week; we proceed to perfect it this, for, on the 18th, by a commencement, the gun which has caused the disaster continued to do duty on board successive men-of-war, on all sorts of stations, for some forty years, when it was returned to Woolwich, and "sentenced" to be reverted. In June, 1850, after undergoing this supposed renovating process, it was issued to Dover, and placed, as we gather, in position for the catastrophe that was to ensue. There was, it is true some considerable laziness about the evidence produced on the question of when a gun really reaches its old age and may be considered worn out—a difference amounting to something between 500 and 3000 rounds being about the outside limit of the probabilities hinted at. But two remarkable points seem to establish themselves with singular distinctness from evidence otherwise not a little conflicting: the metal was "not suitable," and guns placed in forts are no little fired from that it is nobody's business unnecessarily to use if they are in a fit state to be used at all. Add to this that the majority of the guns placed in our coast fortifications have been hitherto supplied by contract, and that any occasion of their being brought into use will afford small space for Parliamentary or other inquiry, and the grave question, so often mooted during these few immediately past years, seems to reopen itself—whether, in spite of Lord Somerset Beauclerk's artillery, for all purposes of national defence, is actually worth much more than those mortars at Sweborg which split up "like turnips" after a few hours' heavy work?

The news from Syria reads dismally indeed. A column of refugees from Damascus has arrived at Beyrout, numbering between 2000 and 3000, "parched with thirst, not half fed, unwashed, with clothes unchanged for nearly a month, choked with dust, covered with flies, and under heavens glowing like brass." Numbers have died on the road, and the convoy seems to have been almost as torrid as their brethren in Damascus. Meanwhile benevolence people, of all ways of thinking, including Sir Culling Eardley and the Pope, are forwarding pecuniary help as fast as is practicable; but more than this is wanted.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The Bishop of London will not hold any more levées until further notice.

The Queen contradicts, on authority, the appointment of Dr. Vaughan to the chancellorship of York.

The parish church of Strood has been reopened for Divine service, after a thorough restoration.

The Chapel of All Saints, until lately known as Bethel Chapel, in the town of St. Peter Port, Guernsey, has been reopened for public worship, after enlargement and restoration.

The restoration of St. Mary Redcliff Church has been brought to a standstill in consequence of the strike of the masons generally throughout Bristol for higher wages.

The English lecturer at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, will commence his course of lectures on "Logic and Rhetoric" and "Reading," with especial reference to the Church service, for candidates for the September ordination.

TESTIMONIALS.—The Rev. H. T. Ellacombe, Rector of Clyst St. George, Devon, has received from a pair of candlesticks by the churchwarden, "in the name and on the behalf of the parishioners and inhabitants," and from the parish clerk the three daughters of the Rector, for their aid in forming the village choir, the latter a purse of gold. The school — at Bradford, Yorkshire, has received an elegant embossed Church Service, and silver pencil-case, have been presented to the Rev. J. Sharp, a former member of the congregation and others of St. Matthew's Church, Wilsden, Bradford.

The ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of St. James's Church, Bay, near Bridgwater, took place on Thursday last by Mrs. Pinnington, of Warden Hall. The new church will be favourably situated on the Bridge Old Road, on a site presented by Mrs. Pinnington, the lady by whom the first stone was laid. It is intended to accommodate 440 persons, and its probable cost will be between £1000 and £1100. The first stone is to be the English Gothic of the fifteenth century. The new district of St. Matthew's, Bayswater, is in course of formation. The present church accommodation has long been inadequate to the wants of a rapidly-increasing population.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. E. Fawcett, Perpetual Curate of Ripon, Yorkshire, Prebendary of Nunn of Ripon Cathedral. Rectories: The Rev. R. G. Benson to Hope Bowdler, Salop; the Rev. C. S. Grueber, Marlesford, Suffolk; the Rev. M. Culley to Ashington, Gloucestershire; the Rev. A. C. B. Cave to Stretton-on-le-Field, Leicestershire; the Rev. J. Bramston, Curate of Hatfield Broad Oak, Essex, to Little Waltham, Essex. Vicarages: The Rev. J. Bramston, Perpetual Curacy: The Rev. F. A. Vincent to St. Chadd, Shiffnal. Curacies: The Rev. J. Wright to Bristol; the Rev. Charles, &c.; the Rev. C. Bulpett to Frome-Selwood, Somerset; Rev. W. A. C. B. Cave to Newcastle-under-Lyme, Staffordshire; the Rev. J. Bramston to Hatfield Broad Oak, Essex; the Rev. Portichead, Bristol; Rev. J. J. Wilmot to Wyvenhoe, Essex; Rev. J. M. Mackay to Bristol; the Rev. Septimus Jones to Bath; the Rev. J. Bramston, Chaplain to the Missions to Seamen's Society; Rev. T. K. Weatherhead to be Chaplain to the Forces, vice Gilbert, resigned.

THE CONVOCATION OF YORK.—On Thursday week the convocation of the province of York met in the Chapter House of York Cathedral, the Archbishop present being supported by the Bishop of Durham over the proceedings. The commissioners stated that it was the desire of the Archbishop that the business should be entered upon without delay, and transacted. He then asked if there were any petitions to present. Archdeacon Hoare, of Nottingham, presented a petition for private communion. Having waited a couple of minutes to enable petitions, if there were any, to be presented, the commissioners read the writ adjourning convocation until the 30th of September next. Meantime Archdeacon Thorp and his friends returned, and the latter expressing their desire to present an address to the Archbishop, which, however, the commissioner refused to receive. He advised that all matters touching business should be deferred until the

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE symptoms of the approach of the termination of the Session, which last week extended to the tone and spirit of members, have, so far as they are concerned, totally disappeared this week. It is true that there are scarcely more than forty of them to be had together at once, but, then, the English representatives are chiefly metropolitan members, and lawyers who, their courts having risen and their circuits having concluded, turn to Parliamentary talk as a refreshment or a restorative. Again, several gentlemen who have been out of town for the last two or three weeks, and have found the country dreary, and damp, and lonely, have rushed back to town for warmth and society, and, having nowhere else to go, take their evenings, naturally go to the House, where they catch a sufficient number of persons to keep up conversation until two in the morning. Then we have retained on these bare Saxon shores that charming phalanx of wit, wisdom, patriotism, eloquence, good taste, good temper, tact, considerateness, self-possession, politeness, brotherly affection, and elegance of manners, which inevitably presents itself to the admiring and appreciating mind, when (with a thrill, and a sensation half fatal half enthusiastic, such as a young lover feels when he approaches the object of his adoration) we mention—the Irish members. With a certain difference of detail, consisting of the Parliament sitting in London, the Union has been repealed for the last week or so. Practically we have had an Irish Parliament. Let us go back to last Thursday week—the subject, education in Ireland. Can it be denied that there was a sense and a state of things which made one vote for (say) Sir Joseph Napier's second reading? For bitterness of spirit, factious antagonism, and religious rancour, you might have supposed that you were living in '98 of blessed memory. As for extravagance of assertion, there was Mr Whiteside, of 7s. voluble member for a South Irish constituency, who positively said that he had been recently at a meeting in Ireland at which there were at least a thousand Roman Catholic priests, and he really seemed surprised at the laughter and cries of "Oh!" with which he was met. Then, again, take another southern member, who, by a freak of fortune in being made a lawyer and a member of Parliament, has deprived the world of the finest village clown as Touchstone is represented to be. Imagine him, professed talker against time, rising at half-past one in the morning to pet and dally, as his manner is, with a serious party trade union question of wages. Then on Friday it was arranged that there should be a sitting on Saturday, in order to finish the Estimates, so that the adjournment to Monday was not moved by the Secretary to the Treasury, and thus the usual occasion of subjects for which there is no room to spare the opportunity would in the ordinary course have been avoided. But an Irish member—remarkable for being to the gossip of the House what a weather-glass is to the dinner-table—rose to move the usual motion, and always spirting out a stream of small wonders and rumours, and who is also famous as the active guardian of the restorative department of the House—took on himself to move the adjournment to Monday, and forthwith plunged into Ancient and Historical Records. The tide thus let loose, in came the regular waves of broguey talk, overwhelming and swamping the poor little public business of the night. The motion being made to go to a Bill for doing what is but a claim to be considered cosmopolitan in his sympathies when he brought forward a motion asking for interference with the King of Dahomey, was to receive a second reading. Nobody—what is he country, we suppose, represents the feast of reason and the flow of soul, and turning the arms of his black guards upon a couple of thousand prisoners, with the view to the childlike (African) pleasure of floating a man-of-war. Some few members were found to be of that among the listeners to the noble member would have it that he had got an idea that Dahomey was somehow or the other rather Irish than not, and that that negative kingdom was at some remote period founded by a Mr. Mahoney and called by his name, but has since been corrupted from its original mellowness into its present shape by the ignorant—coloured—savages. Monday there were a few little summaries of the Session brought forward by Mr. Lindsay, Mr. Hadfield, and such like, and of course in the midst of it up stands an Irish member to deliver his conscience on the subject of the profligate expenditure of the country, and for Lord Palmerston to reply to the whole of the national business. This remarkable gentleman took occasion to state that he had that morning been renewing his innocence, and perhaps assuring his archangelic nature that he was not a spoiler of the goods of others, as those who were ingenuous youths the forty years ago, and he was good enough to produce and to read from the book one of those fables with which the more erudite portions of the volume in question are adorned. On this occasion he had hung the Appropriation Bill on the Irish Bill, was probably inspired by the prospect of relief by the possession of the document into a state like that produced by laughing gas, for he joked, and laughed, and put on an appearance of hilarity and genius and jollity which, coming from him, suggested recollections of the festivities of Colney Hatch. At this time, once more the Irish Parliament. The subjects—the Irishmen; the disputants—Orangemen and Roman Catholics; the rest is left to the imagination. Of course, adjournment at two o'clock in the morning.

On Tuesday more Irish members, or English members for Irish constituencies, the Irish Bill was to be read a third time, and (of course) in the morning Party Emblems again; the rest is confusion worse confounded. We appeal to our readers whether we have not succeeded in the course of this week in the transformation of the Imperial into an Irish Parliament with which we began. We had forgotten that an Irish member has taken up the Syrian question, and has had several skirmishes with the Government, because they have not said much on the Syrian question at once. As to general matters and appearances, the most noticeable are that Lord Palmerston is showing signs that he is feeling the length of the Session to be somewhat crappish and rather heating, something the inconsequence and irrelevancy which characterise the House, which in many respects has the aspect which it bears in the earlier weeks of February. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has got a little more than a spare form is so wasted that he looks like a jockey who has had to lose a number of pounds weight before he can ride a particular race, which his hair is swiftly getting thinner and thinner. Nevertheless, he ought to be ruddy, for he has had a thorough airing in the open air of the Legislative assembly, in the absence of Lord Derby, and under the leadership of Lord Redesdale, who, in his Parliamentary conduct as he is in his appearance, is the representative of the ancient and now extinct protest against innovation, consented to eat their leek by suffering Mr. Gladstone's Surplus Bill, which they had refused to enter-tain, to pass into law. Lord Monteagle, who, in his patriotism and Irish element in the Upper House, has been ruthlessly thrown over on this point; and not only that, he has been delivered over to the prepared and accumulated irony and exasticity of Lord Granville, who in a cutting and slashing speech introduced some verses as applicable to Lord Monteagle, but which could only be brought to bear on him by the circumstance that he had his hair cut short and crispy, and which he has been always renowned for wearing long and flowing over his collar. Lord Granville is a wag. Wonderful to relate, there is not an unattached Law Lord left in potter in the House of Peers, and therefore the Lord Chancellor is obliged to talk to himself.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock, and proceeded to vote the Estimates in Committee of Supply.

The vote of £30,000 for submarine telegraphs gave rise to a discussion, in which Sir G. C. Lewis and the Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the policy of the Government in making contracts and giving guarantees.

An interesting conversation took place on the Civil Service Estimates, in which Mr. Layard, Mr. Cardwell, and Mr. Gladstone took part.

The House subsequently agreed to the Estimates, which were reported.

Petition on Exchequer Bonds and Bills, and read the Militia Pay Bill a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR gave notice that on Friday he should call attention to the question of Law Reform further for the present Session.

The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill passed through Committee.

The Savings Bank Bill, the Stamp Duties (No. 2) Bill, the Inclosure Provisions (Ireland) Act Continuance Bill, and the Defences of the Realm Bill.

The Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill, the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill, the Gunpowder Bill, and the Industrial Schools Act, 1857, Amendment Bill were read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURE.—Mr. LINDSAY called attention to the enormous public expenditure, pointing out that the estimated surplus in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had already been exceeded by six millions, making the amount above £70,000,000. He urged that this large expenditure, which was not perhaps felt while the country was prosperous, continued within it an element of great danger in the event of a bad harvest, or the failure of our present prosperity. One of the causes of expenditure was our naval preparations during the last two years. In 1858 we had 39 screw-steamers afloat, and 242 screw-vessels afloat; this country had no less than 492, while we had a greater number building—in all 734 vessels. Every passing fine commercial treaty with France, all that had been done this Session was to spend...A few remarks on the same subject were made by Mr. HADFIELD and Mr. FRANCIS, in reference to Mr. Lindsay's statements as to the relative strength of the French and English navies. Mr. Francis also took occasion to refer to the system of out-of-line-of-battle ships, whereas we had only 52 screw line-of-battle ships and 20 blockships. Mr. Hadfield contended that to attack the French navy we must have iron-cased frigates, and we were only building four.—Mr. V. SCULLY made some remarks upon the Irish Civil Service Expenditure, in which he was understood that there should be no Reform Bill next Session, and that the Irish Representation Bill would be withdrawn.—Mr. DARRINGTON and others also have an early opportunity of reasserting its taxing privileges, of which they had been deprived by the Reform Act, and of which they had been unjustly passed economy of time, and urged that retrospective declaration on the subject of the privileges of the House was unnecessary at this late period.

TRADE MARKS.—In answer to Mr. Malins and Mr. Bass, Mr. M. GIBSON said that a Bill for amending the trade marks Act of 1857 was now in course of being in this Session. He did not intend to proceed with the Companies Bill.

SURIA.—Mr. MONSELL, referring to a question he had put on Friday with regard to the Government proposals to Lord Palmerston, complained that he had asked Lord Palmerston to explain his answer on that occasion, which was in direct opposition to the statement made by Lord Palmerston in the House of Lords which was calculated to give an impression of encouragement to the Druses. He (Mr. Monsell) had received certain information from Syria, which he thought in the first agreement in the recent disturbances, and complicity on the part of the Turkish authorities, and he thought it was the duty of the Government to see that it was useless to attempt to maintain the Turkish empire.—Lord PALMERSTON said that what he had stated in answer to questions put to him by the honourable gentleman was perfectly correct. He did not suggested to what Power it was to be given. He had stated that it was the opinion of the Government of that Power, not from any particular respect for the Turkish Government, but from the consideration that the integrity of Turkey was accompanied by a European war. The right hon. gentleman had also not stated correctly the cause of the disturbances in Syria. They had originated in Syria arose from the weakness and bad conduct of the Turkish authorities; and if the Turkish Government were left to itself, it would be impossible by successful steps to put an end to them. The facts were that, for several years, the Christians in Syria had been subjected to great oppression, which such an outbreak would occur in the spring; large supplies of European arms had been sent to the Druses. They could not have been obtained among the Maronites, and the first actual outbreak was the burning of some Druse villages by the Maronites. Mr. Thornton, the British Consul at Damascus, and M. Thouvenel, said the first aggression had come from the Maronites, and that the Christians were the first to fire. They could not, therefore, be too careful their people to aggression; though this was, however, no excuse for the atrocities committed by the Druses.

NATIONAL GALLERY.—On the vote for the National Gallery, Mr. COWPER-TEMPLE complained of the inconvenience to, and annoyance caused to visitors by the prohibition of the whole question to another year.—Lord PALMERSTON said that what had been stated was correct, but the obstruction was necessary to the preservation of the pictures.

CIVIL CONTINGENCIES.

Mr. E. JAMES called attention to the Supplementary £3,000 to certain Parliamentary agents for drawing the Reform Bill of 1858, complaining that the charge was excessive, and urging a reduction of it.—The Government whose duty it was to draw all bills. He also complained of a charge of £1,000 for a model of the Victoria Bridge, which was not erected, which had proved so fallacious. He caused much amusement by referring to the two colossal lions at the end of the bridge, and declaring that on his way to the London Islands, and to the King of the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. LAYARD said he intended to move a reduction of £1,000 on the House. From time immemorial it was the custom to pay for the entertainment of foreigners of distinction who visited this country by a grant to the office. As to the charge for the preparation of the Reform Bill, that concerned the Government, and not the House. The model was a matter of which, however, were altogether exceptional.

Mr. HUNT strongly censured a hope that no other Reform Bill costing so much time and money would be brought in next Session.

Mr. GLADSTONE said that in preparing the Reform Bill he struck out.

Mr. GLADSTONE said this was only an account rendered of a sum already paid and voted in the Civil Contingencies of last year, and was past and gone. On the vote for the Civil Contingencies of next year Mr. CONINGHAM moved its rejection. On a division it was retained by 69 to 31.

Mr. V. SCULLY moved the rejection of the vote of £2100 for a model school at Cork. On a division it was retained by 58 to 15.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Appropriation Bill was brought up to read a first time, amidst cheers. The East India Loan Bill was read a third time and passed, after an irregular discussion in which Mr. Bright took part.

The Spirit Duties Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Militia Bill was read a second time.

The Party Emblems (Ireland) Bill was passed through Committee after a lengthy and animated discussion, and reported.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Rifle Volunteer Corps Bill, the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill, the Fortifications (Provision for Expenses) Bill, the Custom (No. 2) Bill, the Inclosure Acts Continuance Bill, and the Defences of the Realm Bill, were read a third time and passed.

The Militia Pay Bill was read a second time.

The East India Loan Bill was brought up and read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

At the morning sitting the Appropriation Bill and the Exchequer Bonds (£2,600,000) Bill were read a second time.

The Exchequer Bonds (£2,600,000) Bill was through Committee, as did the Militia Pay Bill and the Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Bill.

The Lunacy Regulation Bill was read a first time.—Court of Chancery Bill, and passed several clauses, when the Chairman reported progress, and the House resumed, and adjourned.

NEW ZEALAND.—At the evening sitting Lord PALMERSTON stated that it was his intention to introduce a Bill next Session to amend the...the object of which was to protect the interest of the aborigines—it being thought that it could be more properly discussed; and Mr. Locke, who referred to the existing powers of the officers of the Crown would prove sufficient for the purpose, replied that he could not agree with the noble Lord in the opinion that the Bill, evidently intending a long speech, complained that he had been treated with discourtesy.—Mr. WYNDHAM, in explanation, said he had been informed that in consequence of a letter which he had received from the Secretary of the Treasury stating that the Bill would be withdrawn. He believed that the Government knew that even in the present state of the House they could not have passed it. He also regretted that a despatch had not been received from the Governor of New Zealand which ought at once to have put an end to the Bill. After a discussion, in which Mr. Bright took part, the Bill was discharged.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE.—The House went into Committee on the Naval Discipline Bill, and Lord C. PAGET stated its objects, which were to amend the Act of Charles II., under which the discipline of the Navy and the articles of war were founded. At present, in the Navy no court-martial could be held unless five ships were present, and it frequently happened that for many days no court-martial could be held at a time. It was proposed to make the presence of three ships sufficient, and in the Indian and Chinese seas that of two ships of war. It was proposed that the courts-martial should not inflict the punishment of death unless unanimously agreed to by the members. Power to inflict less if offence were classified, and corresponding punishments awarded. Power was given to sentence to penal servitude or other such punishment as was deemed appropriate to the crime. No definition was given of mutiny, but every mutinous act was provided for. The various degrees of the capital punishment were also dealt with. Powers were taken to enable the naval authorities to secure a greater efficiency against offenders on shore. It was to be permitted to courts-martial to find a prisoner tried for a high offence guilty of a lesser crime, and to award a proportionate punishment. It was the opinion of the Admiralty that such a proportionate punishment should be established; but the system of classification of characters like that in the Army, by which no man was liable to flogging unless he had forfeited his exemption by misconduct, had been found to work well with the most beneficial effect. By the Bill as proposed, however, a man was accused of an offence of which would render him liable to corporeal punishment, there could not be any inquiry into his past character, and no report made to the Captain, who would be at liberty to inquire into the character of the witness for the purpose of judging of the amount of credit to be given to his evidence and betrayed in reference to the clause. In the course of his observations he was called to order by the Speaker for certain language he had used. His argument was that the clause as it stood was injurious to the interests of the Service.—Lord PALMERSTON (CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER) explicitly denied that there had been any breach of faith on the part of the Government in the matter. He proposed a clause which was the result of an arrangement accepted to by the whole House.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER BILL.—Mr. HUBBARD moved that the Committee on this Bill. A division took place on a clause proposed by Mr. HADFIELD relating to the appointment of a new Queen's Remembrancer clerk in the Court clerk's office, which was carried by 38 to 32.—A division took place on a clause proposed by Mr. KINNAIRD giving the Queen's Remembrancer clerk to the Exchequer the same salary as the other clerks, and it was rejected by 32 to 32. The House then resumed.

EXCHEQUER BILL, &c., AMENDMENT BILL.—On the consideration of Lords' amendments to this bill, Mr. B. OSBORNE made an attack on the Commission which had been appointed to inquire into the Post Office, and with the funds in their charge, and moved an amendment to the effect that any augmentation of salary or pension or any gratuities should not be paid before the two Houses of Parliament six weeks prior to the cause of the Commission which had been appointed to inquire into the expenditure of the vote to the Lords' amendments, and could not be moved.—The SPEAKER stated in this view—The Lords' amendments were agreed to.

Some other business was also disposed of.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill and the Exchequer Bonds or Bills (£2,600,000) Bill passed through Committee.

The Militia Pay Bill and the Metropolitan Police Clockyards Bill were read a third time and passed.

LAW OF LIBEL AMENDMENT.—The House went into Committee on this bill, and resumed progress at clause 14.—Mr. HUBBARD moved to add to the clause "and the schools for the instruction of poor children in or contiguous to" to provide for the erection of another church or parsonage within the limits of any district or parish, which was agreed to.—Mr. HUBBARD moved that the clause stand part of the bill a division took place, and it was carried by 38 to 28.—

On clause 19, to exempt the Inns of Court and the Inns of Chancery from the operation of certain parishes in the city of London, under an obsolete statute of Queen Mary VII., to demolish churches in the city; and on which clause to repeal all the rights and privileges attached to the parishes, unless some proviso was added to the clause, Mr. HUBBARD moved that the clause stand part of the statute of Henry VIII.—After some discussion, Mr. BOUVERIE consented to take the matter into consideration, and the other clauses were agreed to, and others were brought up and added to the bill.—Mr. VANCE moved a clause providing that no action for libel should be maintained unless permission had been obtained from the Attorney-General, and was agreed to.—The House then resumed.

The Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment Bill was with leave.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL.—On the motion for the third reading of this bill, Mr. BUTT moved that it be committed, but, after a short discussion, the motion was withdrawn and the bill read a third time and passed.

The Party Emblems (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

CHURCH TEMPORALITIES (IRELAND) ACT.—In Committee on this bill, Mr. CARDWELL explained the amendments, and they were agreed to. The House then resumed.

The Appropriation Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Militia Pay Bill was read a third time and passed.

Several other bills were advanced a stage.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after two o'clock.

NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.—On the motion of Mr. CONINGHAM a return was ordered of the pictures purchased for the National Portrait Gallery, with the prices paid for each, and the names of the persons from whom they were purchased.

THE BISHOP OF PARAGUAY.—Lord PALMERSTON, in answer to Mr. Maguire, said that Mr. Canstall had been very cruelly imprisoned by the Government of Paraguay, but that Her Majesty's Government had demanded compensation for Mr. Canstall's unjust confinement, which had not been at all satisfactorily met by the Government of Paraguay. He hoped that Republic had been interrupted.

THE TELEGRAPH BETWEEN LONDON AND DUBLIN.—Mr. LAING, in reply to Mr. Scully, said that the new arrangements regarding the mails between London and Dublin would have the effect on the 1st of August. Owing, however, to an accident to one of the new boats, the time had been deferred, but the Post Office authorities were ready to carry out the plan of the contract at any time.

THE SUEZ CANAL SCHEME.—Lord PALMERSTON, in answer to Mr. H. Seymour, said it was quite true that the Pacha of Egypt had been induced by the £4,000 shares, to withdraw from the Canal Company, in which a second company, which, he (Lord Palmerston) had often said, was, in his opinion, one of the greatest delusions of the modern London times. When many not coming forward as quickly as was desirable it appeared M. Lesseps endeavoured to induce the Pacha to take shares to the amount of £3,000,000, which he refused the Pacha's credit, without the Pacha's knowledge, for a large additional amount of shares. There had been communications on the subject between the British and French Governments, and the French Government had declined to take any part in the matter. Her Majesty's Government also knows that French projectors frequently undertook speculations of such a character without the approval of their Government. He (Lord Palmerston) had received no instruction to negotiate with the French Government on the subject.

In reply to Mr. Cardwell, Lord PALMERSTON further stated that he was fully authorised to negotiate what remained to be settled of the treaty with Portugal, and hoped to conclude it shortly.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPHS.—Mr. LAING, in reply to Mr. S. Sigerson, on the subject of the submarine telegraph from Suakim in Nubia to Jeddah in Arabia, stated that the latest intelligence received from the Austrian Consul at Suakim was that the difficulties and obstructions which had retarded would be necessary. They therefore proposed that instead of a guarantee of £10,000 a year for ten years they should agree to an annual payment of that amount. Various attempts had been made to lay down cables, but without success. Now, however, the undertaking had a work, the Government had frankly stated that they could not undertake to carry out the conversion of the proposed guarantee.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:—The Appropriation Bill, the Militia Pay Bill, and the Naval Discipline Bill.

DIVORCE COURT BILL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

On the order of the day for the adjourned debate upon the amendment of Mr. Bramston to the motion for the second reading read a second time, Mr. Locke said—

Lord PALMERSTON said he concurred in the opinion expressed by the Speaker in reference to the infringement of the rights and privileges of that House contained in the House of Commons' Bill for the framing of the title and bill of the Divorce Court. The Commons should maintain their rights and privileges. Considering, however, that the Commons' Bill had been before the House at least two or three times since the 1st of May, he could not believe it to think that the House would act wisely by adopting the recommendation made by the Speaker in the latter part of his clear and able observations, to the effect that, inasmuch as the Lords had abstained from the practice of interfering with Money Bills, the Commons should waive the objection of the House of Commons had been communicated to them, that House might, after a lengthy discussion, have been taken to be equivalent to a refusal, and allow the bill to be read a second time. He (Lord Palmerston) should, therefore, move to read the bill a second time, but he would suggest that a special entry should be made in the journals of the House stating the reasons which induced them to consent to read the measure a second time.

Sir J. Graham said that, though his first impression was in favour of a more energetic course in vindication of their undoubted rights and privileges, he was disposed to adopt the more cautious consideration of all the circumstances of nevertheless, upon a more cautious consideration of all the circumstances of the case, he was disposed to support Mr. Hennessy withdrew his amendment.

After some conversation as to the form of the Bill itself, contending that it Mr. Malins then stated his objections to the bill itself, contending that it was calculated to destroy the sanctity of marriage, by giving power to a single Judge to divorce parties. From the number of cases that had been disposed of in the undefended list, without opposition it was reasonable to suppose that there was collusion between the husband and wife in a great many instances. The Solicitor-General gentleman concluded by moving that the bill be read a second time that day (words).

Mr. Bowyer seconded the amendment.

After a few words from Mr. Cairns, in which the Attorney-General defended the bill, the amendment was negatived by a majority of 43 to 11.

The second reading of the bill was, and, upon the motion of the Attorney-General, the House went into Committee upon it, when the clauses, after some amendments, were agreed to, the duration of the bill being limited to the 31st of July, 1862.

Several other bills were advanced a stage.

THE THEATRES.

St. James's.—This theatre still continues open for the summer season, and on Monday night came into the domain of the legitimate drama by the performance of "Hamlet." The occasion was the first appearance of Mr. Harry Sullivan in that character. Report says that Sullivan has much improved his physique by his trip, and has acquired a more sententious delivery. In other respects his performance of this character resembles his previous identity. This actor has deservedly won a high reputation by his graceful and elegant performances of the meditative Prince, and frequently delivers the text, when he does not capriciously alter it, with discrimination and power. The soliloquies were portrayed with much of the delightful grace which distinguishes and their significance with an especial prominence; but the passion was, perhaps, too much sacrificed by the elocutionary. Mr. Sullivan had an appreciative audience, and his best points met with suitable applause. Of the other characters, Mr. Tilbury's Polonius deserves great commendation for the discrimination manifested in it. He delineated a truly Shakspearean spirit, which cannot be too much encouraged. We only wish he would curtail that prosy, old gentleman. Mr. Chester, Ghost, and Mr. Green's Claudius, to the remaining performers. Miss Percy's Queen was below criticism. She reduced the story of poor Ophelia to a farce, and evidently from sheer ignorance of the author's full poetical description as it stands in the book. Miss Katharine Hickson's acting of Ophelia was one of great merit, and a performance which, fortunately for good taste, we now seldom witness even on the suburban boards. The management, however, deserves credit for the ground of an unobjectionable play having been prepared for the due performance of heavy tragedy. Mr. Robin's Gravedigger was not to rich in humour as we had expected. With these exceptions, the performance went off well.

Standard.—On Saturday, "The Wife" was performed, and with considerable success. Mr. Richards as Sir Walter, Mr. Marriott as Mariana, acted with a laudable zeal to give full effect to the dialogue and situations. The piece was almost new to the audience, not having been performed for many years; it was, however, accepted with evident satisfaction.

Adelphi.—The talking fish having proved a great hit, Mr. E. T. Smith has experimented, so as to produce a repetition, in a performing hippopotamus. This animal is remarkable for its fatness, yet shows signs of intelligence, though locomotively on the unwieldy side, and reposing its head blindly enough on the arms cushions. It appears to have been discovered when about five days old, and to have been brought up in habits of human companionship. It permits its owner to put his head into its mouth and to ride upon its back. We have, however, that it can be ferocious, and will not tolerate the stick. It is about two years and a half old.

SCRAPS.

English Volunteers for Garibaldi's Army.—An attempt has been made by Mr. Crawshay, the Mayor of Gateshead, to enforce the Foreign Enlistment Act against the publication of the Newcastle Daily Chronicle. That journal has published certain articles favourable to Signor Mazzini's visit to this country. Whatever Mr. Crawshay's object being, as is well known, to organise an English battalion for service under Garibaldi, Mr. Crawshay appeared before the borough magistrates on Monday, for the purpose of preferring his charge and stating the grounds upon which it was based. The magistrates declined to grant the warrant for which Mr. Crawshay had applied; and in giving their decision they stated that the act of enlisting for the purpose mentioned, that there had been no personal contact between the Chronicle and the individuals alleged to be wrongly and, hadly, enlisted. The magistrates, instead of amounted only to an historical statement of Captain Styles's proceedings. Mr. Crawshay then announced the magistrates' decision, and that the case into the Court of Queen's Bench and apply for a mandamus against them for refusing a warrant.

Testimonial to Captain Huish.—Upon the retirement of Captain Huish, on the 1st of July last, from the office of secretary to the London and North-western Railway, an address (which, together with the reply, appears on the other page) was drawn up and signed by upwards of a thousand of the officers and servants of that company, expressive of their regret and esteem, and to which a handsome piece of plate was subscribed. On Wednesday, the 8th inst., upon which day the leading officers of the company had met in luncheon at Euston Square Station, and assembled round the signatures, engrossed upon vellum and elegantly bound, was presented by Mr. Stewart, on behalf of the subscribers; and Mr. Huish, in feeling and happiness of the gratified gentleman and his lady were most enthusiastically cheered. It was accordingly to Captain Huish, after an uninterrupted period of two years, to find no nuisance a body of his old comrades then assembling round him, and proving that the feelings of respect and regard for his address are still unchanged. The amount subscribed for the testimonial to accompany the address remains in the hands of the treasurer, and when Mr. Huish has fixed upon a permanent residence, when some suitable works of art will be purchased and placed in his new home.

Adulteration of Food and Drink.—The new Act for preventing the adulteration of articles of food and drink has been printed, but, before it can be of public service, it requires the adoption by the Society of London the Commissioners of Sewers, and in all other parts of the metropolis by the vestries and district boards acting in pursuance of the local Government Act, and the Court of Sessions and borough councils in other parts, may appoint one or more persons possessing competent skill in chemical, and microscopic knowledge, as analysts of all articles of food and drink purchased within their limits, and may remunerate them for their services. Huish has fixed upon a permanent residence, when some suitable works of art will be purchased and placed in his new home.

Adulteration of Food and Drink.—The new Act for preventing the adulteration of articles of food and drink has been printed, but, before it can be of public service, it requires the adoption by the Society of London the Commissioners of Sewers, and in all other parts of the metropolis by the vestries and district boards acting in pursuance of the local Government Act, and the Court of Sessions and borough councils in other parts, may appoint one or more persons possessing competent skill in chemical, and microscopic knowledge, as analysts of all articles of food and drink purchased within their limits, and may remunerate them for their services. The Act provides that any person who shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or drink which is not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by such purchaser, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5 for the first offence, and not exceeding £10 for the second offence, and for every subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding £20. The penalty is to be in accordance with the Hythe rules, and the rules used for all the prizes will be the same as are now forbidden except in the case of the Hythe rules.

The National Rifle Association.—The Council of the National Rifle Association, having received their instructions from the meeting, in 1861, her Majesty's prize and the gold medal of the association shall be competed for on the same days as the Queen's prize, by marksmen of the United Kingdom to a competition with rifles of a minimum bore of .451 and a minimum weight of 9½lbs., the pull of which shall not be less than 10lbs. This competition will take place at Hythe early in February. Each competitor will have to make a declaration of bore and weight and quality. The rifles will be free from false mechanical rests, but the one that gives the best score will be entitled to the distinction of the first prize. The rifles, together with the gold medal of the association, shall be competed for, subject to the conditions of the Queen's prize, by marksmen using rifles of a number or rifles required by the council within a time specified, and of their being to be selected by the council from those chosen.

Sham Fight in Surrey.—In spite of the hurricane of wind and rain last Saturday a sham fight took place on Wimbledon Common. At 4 p.m. Mr. H. Fox Warren, near Weybridge. The "British" force consisted of the Hythe Battalion, 1,000 men, under Colonel Lord Elcho, M.P.; Colonel Dick Bewicke, Captain Sir Fowell Buxton; and Artists, Captain Phillips. The "Invaders," of the Victoria Rifles, 1,000 men, under Col. Lord Ranelagh, Captain Cochrane. The "Invaders" were at first concealed from the spectators in a distant hollow. The "British" were supposed to be ignorant of the tremendous volley poured by them into a reconnoitring party of the "British," although the latter were in full view. The "British" then pushed onwards of a fortnight ago, the object being to inure the volunteers to the worrying duties of outpost service, and to bring them into collision and on the shore, where they may by constant practice morning and evening, learn to become expert swimmers, and to acquire the confidence in the use of oars and the hills, about five minutes' walk from the railway station, and each force appears to have been concentrated on a point of vantage to command some parts of the ground. Altogether there are forty-one tents, including the quarters and hospital. The Victoria Rifles encamped on the ground early in a fixed tariff. The "lines" including the camp are indicated by small flags, which also mark the outposts and sentries, and the ground is well chosen. At night sentinels guard the ground by watches, and in other respects strict military discipline is observed. The men are under canvas for a week, and they prepare for drill, rifle-shooting, skirmishing, &c., which generally begin at six o'clock. Reveille is at sunrise, and, after the men have had their breakfast, return to town about nine o'clock to engage in the business of the day, leaving the tents in charge of a few men who attend to cooking and other domestic duties. The same routine of training is observed in the evening. On Saturday and Wednesday afternoons the men have a holiday, and on Sunday they attend Divine service. The Hythe Battalion is encamping" is enlivened by two or three bands of music from the regiments. The Rifle Brigade, 1st Battalion, 1st Division, 1st Brigade, afternoon, the sixth company of the 1st Administrative Battalion of Surrey Rifle Volunteers, under Captain Hall, at Wilton. The officers has provided three prizes for the best shots of the company themselves had also subscribed a small sum, to be won by the best shots of the company. The first prize was won by Private Hall, who made a score as follows:—1st, Pocklethurst; 2nd, Griffin; 3rd, Whiteley; 4th, Hall.

Presentation of Silver Bugles.—The 5th Hants Rifles, under the command of Lieut.-Col. F. Vaughan, have been presented, on the Governor's-green, Portsmouth, for the purpose of having presented to them the right silver bugles, by Mrs. Vaughan, the lady of the lieut.-colonel. A light wind was blowing, and the ceremony took place at Ryde, Isle of Wight, on Tuesday, when the corps, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Vaughan, was presented with two silver bugles, in the grounds of Ryde House Park, the residence of Lieut.-Col. Vaughan. The same day the Ormskirk Rifle Volunteers (Ormskirk) Rifle Volunteers were reviewed by Sir T. G. Hesketh, Bart., on his own private estate, Easton, by Lieut.-Colonel Fleetwood Hesketh. The volunteers acquitted themselves most creditably, and were highly complimented on the entire by Sir Thomas. The corps afterwards marched past in front of a raised platform, when the Ormskirk corps were presented with a silver bugle by Miss Hesketh, and the Scarisbrick corps with a silver bugle by Miss Scarisbrick, and of the Ormskirk corps in particular. A silver bugle was presented to the Lancashire Prince Volunteers, on Tuesday evening, by Lady William Wynn, in Wynnstay Park, near Wrexham, the proceedings terminating with a review of the corps by Lady Wynn. The corps is about 200 strong.

Presentation of Colours.—Yesterday week colours were presented to the 3rd Durham Rifle Volunteers by Lady Susan Vane Tempest. Her Ladyship arrived at the Seaham Hall Station, and was received by the Marquis of Londonderry, and drove to the Garrison Parade-ground in an open carriage, the corps marching before her. The colours, consisting of the Union Jack Adelphus Vane Tempest, were drawn up in line, and, after giving the salute and receiving the colours, the ceremony of consecrating the colours was proceeded with, when her Ladyship delivered a spirited address, to which the Rev. Mr. Hall replied.

The Bristol Volunteer Rifle Corps will be inspected to-day (Saturday) by Colonel Dyer.

Volunteer Friendly Societies.—Lord Grosvenor, the Marquis of Donegal, and Lieutenant-Colonel Fleetwood Hesketh, have each addressed a notice stating that they decline to lend their countenance to the various Volunteer friendly societies which have been established in their districts. They intimate that a general scheme, approved by the Minister of War, and entitled to the support of the Government, has been prepared for the consideration of the London Rifle Brigade.—The regimental committees of this brigade have decided that the prizes to be competed for annually by the marksmen of the corps, will take place some time in next October, when challenge medals and other prizes will be competed for. The Duke of Cambridge has also sanctioned the formation of cadet companies; and the subscription will be almost immediately opened for the purpose.

Rifle-shooting Match at Sheffield.—On Monday and Tuesday a rifle-shooting match took place at Sheffield, on the Hyde-park ground, for a gold belt in aid of the funds of the Sheffield and Rotherham Licensed Victuallers' Asylum. The belt was won by Mr. Thomas Hargreaves. The prizes were four rifles, two given by the licensed victuallers, and two by Captains Brown and Ellis. Mr. Wm. Hargreaves, of Sheffield, and Mr. Rose took the first prize; Joseph Brown, second prize; Private Marriott, third prize; Captain Ellis, fourth prize.

Second Battalion of Essex Volunteers.—This battalion was officially inspected on Saturday evening last, at Leyton, by Colonel Lord de Saumarez, Assistant Inspector of Volunteers. The battalion, having closed up, was put through, in the most satisfactory manner, the ordinary battalion drill, and a variety of field movements, concluding by throwing out the 1st company as skirmishers. The latter were then formed into square to resist cavalry with the excellent and steady manner in which they had acquitted themselves throughout the day. The inspecting officer expressed himself highly pleased, and that the best system had been adopted.

Review of the Eastern and South Devon Rifle Battalion.—The Companies of this battalion assembled for the first time in one body on the 2nd inst., and were reviewed by Lieut.-Col. Buller, C.B., commanding at Dawlish, on the 4th inst. The battalion, consisting of seven companies, mustered 500 strong, and marched past the inspector (Major Hume) first in line, then in quick, and lastly in double time. These movements were rendered unusually difficult, owing to the formation of the ground, which was carving and sloping. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, however, the manœuvres were executed with considerable precision, and were highly creditable to the corps. Lieut.-Colonel Hume, as well as of others of long standing in the regular Army. Subsequently, flank movements were performed; and the battalion then commenced firing with their cartridge. This was at first done in companies, then in wings, and lastly in battalion. Finally, all the troops on the ground—including the Earl of Devon's troop of yeomanry, the battalion of rifles, and the artillery—marched past in quick time. This movement was one of the grandest of the day, and was deservedly admired by the spectators with which it was executed. At the termination the troops were formed into close columns and were addressed by Major Hume, who expressed himself highly gratified with the soldierly and very steady manner in which they had performed the duties of the day. The Exeter and South Devon battalion is the oldest volunteer rifle corps in the kingdom, the Victoria Rifles being next.

The sum of £430 has been subscribed in Ross and Cromarty shires for the purpose of providing some permanent memorial to the late Sir Hugh Munro.

Through the exertions of Mr. T. Dyke Acland about forty officers and noncommissioned officers of the Devon and Somerset Militia, with the band, were assembled during the past week in Exeter for musketry practice and drill on the principles laid down by Hythe.

Volunteer Fête at Charlton Park.—A volunteer fête, on an extensive scale, was held on Saturday last in the beautiful park, which is part of Sir Thomas M. Wilson, at Old Charlton, the grounds to be in aid of a band fund. The arrangements for the fête were under the direction of Mr. Jones, the gymnasium is of a varied nature.

Volunteering in Knowsley Park.—This fête, on Saturday last, was intended to be one of more than ordinary interest. It is the Earl of Derby's wish that the Knowsley Park Volunteers should be added to the garrison of Liverpool, which is expected will be present. [Special arrangements have been made for attending the Knowsley Park Review.]

Sir Harry Smith is, we are happy to learn, nearly recovered from his recent indisposition.

We understand that several vacancies now exist in mail services both in the Mediterranean and Levant, and in the West.

The Adjutant-General has issued a circular memorandum directing that in a civil court, and before a magistrate, a soldier not under arrest should remain uncovered.

The Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the state of the Royal Arsenals has expanded its labours, and will not resume its sittings until the 16th of October.

A large range of buildings is now to be erected at Brompton Barracks, Chatham, for the purpose of a new school of practice, school of design, class-rooms, and schools for the instruction of the officers and men of the Royal Artillery and Engineers, and their families.

The launch of the Orestes from Sherncss Dockyard took place last Saturday. She is a screw steam sloop of 1,707 tons burthen, 300 horse power, weighing 60 tons, besides one 68-pounder 16-ft. pivot-gun, weighing 70 cwt., which can be worked on either broadside, and two 32-pounder broadside guns.

The Government having decided on strengthening the fortifications at the Island of St. Helena, and adding to the strength of the troops and native regiments already there, the Royal Artillery and Engineers have left Chatham and Woolwich for Plymouth, to be conveyed in Royal Engineers and Royal Artillery, with nearly 200 other troops of the line, by the Himalaya.

The Gibraltar, 101, was safely launched at Devonport at half-past five o'clock on Thursday last. Mr. Peak, Master Shipwright, in the presence of Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Pasley, the French Ambassador and the Countess de Persigny, Admiral Dacres, and others. The ceremony of "christening" was performed by Miss Edgcumbe, daughter of the Hon. George Edgcumbe.

One of Sir William Armstrong's 40-pounders burst while being tested at Woolwich, on Wednesday week, with double the ordinary charge of powder and shot. The gun was thoroughly destroyed, but only in its rocket. The remaining portion of the gun remained uninjured, and it is stated that the experiment has proved the admirable weakness of the fulcrum away.

A Naval Court-martial sat on Wednesday to try the case of Lieut. J. W. O'Grady, late of the Ex, who was charged with calling the First-lieutenant a liar, and striking him "Guilty," and sentenced to be dismissed the following manner:—£1000 to his grandson, Charles Harding Fanshawe, and the other £1000 to his grandson, Thomas Fanshawe. George Harding gave no other bequests contained in the will, which bears date the 23rd of April, 1853, and was proved by the oaths of Thomas, Lord Ely, and Sir A. Lawley, Bart., Lincolnfields.

C. Fow, Esq.: The will of Charles Few, Esq., of Streatham-hill, Surrey, formerly of Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, solicitor, who died at his residence, Streatham-hill, on the 2nd of July last, at the age of eighty-three, was proved in the principal registry of the Court of Probate on the 31st of the same month by the oaths of Charles Few, Henrietta-street, Cavendish-square, and Robert Broom, of Brixton-hill, surgeon, who are nominated executors. The testator bequeaths his property, which is of the value of under, 1889. The personal property was sworn under £45,000. The deceased bequeaths £1000 to his grandson, Charles Few, £1000 to his grandson, and his daughter Catherine, who resided with him, an immediate legacy of £100. And he gives to his daughter Catherine, for her life, the use of the residue of his entire estate; and to this disposition he has also given a very considerable testimonial, by bequeathing to her during her life the house in which he resided and receive and entertain company during her life. The testator directs that his executors, during the first twelve after his decease, the expense of which is to be defrayed out of the proceeds of his estate, shall pay to the trustees of the Royal Literary Fund the sum of £100, a tribute of affection, consisting of plated corner-dishes, &c., was presented to him by his clerks, on the occasion of his leaving the office after having held it seventeen years. This token of regard he has bequeathed to his son Charles. He also bequeaths to his son Charles his gold watch and chain, as a particular bounty of natural history: this has been carried out by bequeathing to his son Charles his collection of Norfolk birds, consisting of ninety-five, his cabinet of fossils, some specimens of which he particularly valued as having been collected by him in the cliffs of Norfolk when a youth travelling in a foreign land. The will then goes on to distribute, after the payment of legacies, the residue of the property, which is considerable, one-sixth to each of his children, and concludes with some small legacies to his servants.

Mr. Thomas Hardwick, of Streatham-hill, Surrey, formerly Park, and of Birmingham, is reported to have died what is termed "a millionaire." This vast amount of property has been left to his grandchildren and their descendants, accompanied by a very careful, or, as may be considered, rather a parsimonious, will. Mr. Hardwick, of Norfolk when a youth travelling in a foreign land. The will then goes on to distribute, after the payment of legacies, the residue of the property, which is considerable, one-sixth to each of his children, and concludes with some small legacies to his servants.

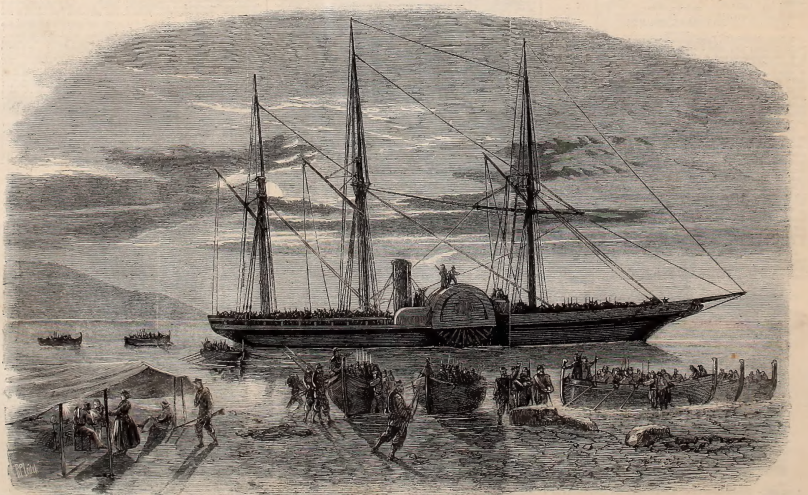
An interesting experiment was recently made to obtain a direct telegraphic communication between Calcutta and Madras, a distance nearly 1200 miles. A short conversation took place; the telegraph clerk at Madras communicating with that office the following words from a pun: the clerk in the Prussian capital replying that it had just struck three, and that the signal between the two offices distance had taken only a few seconds.

The Taaffe Peerage Case.—This case was, after three years' litigation, decided on Friday, the 17th inst., by the Committee for Privileges of the House of Lords in favour of the Irish claimant. The counsel were Dr. Twiss, Q.C., Serjeant Burke, and Mr. Digby; the Attorneys-General for the Crown, Sir Richard Bethell and Sir Hugh Cairns, appeared. Charles, tenth Viscount Taaffe, and Baron of Ballymote, a Count of the Holy Roman Empire, died in 1704, and was succeeded by his eldest surviving son, one of the most accident families in Ireland. Their viscounty was obtained by Theobald, the first viscount, a son of William Taaffe, Lord Taaffe, Spanlards of Ardsallagh. Charles II. raised Theobald, second Earl of Carlingford, who was in favour with the Emperor Leopold, to the rank of a count, but that title is now extinct. Latterly the claim has been confined to the descendants of the second son, Francis, one of the family being the famous Nicholas, Count Taaffe, who beat the Turks at Belgrade. Of the claimant's great-grandfather, Joseph, the seventh Viscount, was born in London, and thus, by virtue of an Act of George II., he himself had become a British subject. The question was very ably argued by Dr. Twiss. The Lord Chancellor, in delivering judgment in favour of the claimant, expressed himself gratified that the Lords were now enabled to re-establish in its honours this old and distinguished family. The present Viscount Taaffe has large estates, and a seat, called the Castle of Ettschau, in Bohemia.



THE REVOLUTION IN SICILY.—THE PEOPLE RELANDING WITH THEIR CHATTELS AT MESSINA, AFTER THE BATTLE OF MELAZZO.—FROM A SKETCH BY T. NAST.

DESTRUCTION OF THE MARTELLO TOWER, EASTBOURNE, SUSSEX, BY SIR W. ARMSTRONG'S GUNS, AT A DISTANCE OF 1032 YARDS.

ARTILLERY EXPERIMENTS ON A MARTELLO TOWER NEAR EASTBOURNE.

WITHIN half a mile of the redoubt at Eastbourne stands No. 71 Martello Tower, which, having become useless, was selected for the trial of Sir W. Armstrong's guns on Tuesday, the 7th instant. The Duke of Cambridge and a brilliant staff of artillery and other officers were present on the occasion, furnished with a telegraphic and photographic apparatus, which were in constant use. The guns employed were a 40-pounder of 31 cwt., an 80-pounder of 63 cwt., and a short 100-pounder, weighing only 53 cwt. The distance was 1032 yards, and the projectiles employed were partly solid shot and partly percussion-shells. The tower was built of very strong brickwork, the thickness of the walls being 7 ft. 3 in. on the land side, and 9 ft. on the side next the sea. The roof, or platform, consisted of a massive vault of great strength, supported by the walls and by a solid pillar of brickwork occupying the centre of the tower. The 80-pounder shot was found to pass quite through the wall into the tower, piercing 7 ft. 3 in. of brickwork; the others lodged in the wall at the depth of about 5 ft. Live shells were then fired, and with so much effect that, after eight or ten rounds from each gun, the interior of the tower became exposed to view. The centre pillar supporting the bomb-proof roof was speedily knocked away, but the structure was so compact that the vault continued to stand, and was only brought down by a succession of shells exploded in the brickwork. Nothing could exceed the precision with which these shells were thrown. The broken section of the wall was itself but a small object to hit, but this was done with such unerring certainty that the very spot selected was almost invariably struck. The total number of shot and shell fired against the tower was 176, of which only a small proportion was from the 100-pounder. The 100-pounder gun used on this occasion throws shell which weigh 100lb. and contain 6lb. of powder, and yet the weight of the gun with which these tremendous projectiles are discharged is less than that of the ordinary 32-pounder, the weight of which is 56 cwt.

THE FARM.

An eminent meteorologist published his impressions last Monday that "after the sun has passed his conjunction with Saturn on the 23rd, the month will be much warmer than average—probably" and hence we can only hope that his ideas may come true, and that the dictatorship of St. Swithin may end at last. The hay in many counties will take a fortnight of finishing yet before the farmers can "put all hands" to the corn-field; but with their "Burgess and Key," and continued fine weather to help them, we may see the harvest pretty general towards the end of next week. The long delay in the process of ripening has made the depredations of birds a serious item in the general account.

In these days of agricultural science, when speakers consider it the height of modesty to raise a laugh or a derisive cheer at the expense of Mr. Mechi, it is gratifying to find a landlord of Colonel Lowther's experience and high intellectual rank, like Mr. Hodgkinson at Cumberland agricultural dinner were to this effect:—"He had also visited Mr. Mechi's farm. He never saw more even crops of wheat, oats, and wheat; and in his opinion they deserved every praise. Here was not a single fault to find. He was there for a few days, and could assure them they were far superior to any of the agricultural exhibitions which had been rather in contempt. (Laughter.) As for Mr. Mechi's expense in growing his crops he could not tell at that time as he knew little of the subject; but the crops he could see to be seen better crops. Mr. Mechi had been at great expense in managing by irrigation. With the assistance of a pump he could throw water to any part of the farm, so that it was irrigated a whole field." (Cheers.)

At the Tenantry meeting, Mr. Atherton, of Speke, almost swept the board of the shorthorn prizes, and one of Sir Thomas Hesketh's were the ribbons as "the best handled bull." The quality were in very high condition, as they usually are in Lancashire. Dead fully wet weather quite marred the pleasure of the Cumberland and Westmoreland Show at Penrith, which was held in the meadows in the shape of a prize for purses under thirteen hands, which was won by a little "Cumbrian pony" belonging to Captain Spencer, of Distington. This gentleman also stood up well for the honour of the county shorthorns with his Dubbin spring winner Young Ben, and his yearling heifer Miss Ruby, from Lazy, which he purchased at Mr. Grenfell's sale. Mr. Ambler was, however, too strong for the locals with a shorthorn bull, consisting of Wild Eyes, West Eastern, and Necklace; and the two former finished first and second for the Challenge Cup, which Mr. Ambler has held for the last twelve months with his Prince Frederick. The most conspicuous defect broken in the county showed nothing; but the Leicesters came out right well, and Messrs. Jefferson and Graham's yearling gilts for yearling Sweet Spencer, of Thrimbar, bred by Mr. Pawlett. The Royal North Lancashire Show is to take place at Preston on Wednesday and Thursday next.

We hear that Mr. Donglas has sold Eaglet, by Booth's War Eagle, which was third in its yearling heifer class at Dumfries, to Lord Strathallan; and two more of his young bulls, by Sir Arthur Fenton, all of them by Sir James the Rose, and five of them from cows bred at Warlaby and Killerby, are reported for sale by private contract. The Americans prefers to have introduced a new herd topic in the shape of a machine for milking cows in three to five minutes. A cousin of a Yankee has moved by him handling and performing the operation by air-pump suction. The pumps are made of tin and indiarubber, and are to be worked by steam. The machine has flexible joints, so as to fit any size of udder. The Shropshire sheep market has been pretty well up to the average. The purchases on Monday of rams at Mr. Preece's first sale, near Shrewsbury, last Tuesday week, were one at 70 gs., two at 53 gs., and two at 42 gs. Sheep sales will be very busy next week. On Tuesday Mr. John Browin's Cotswolds (which have won an immense number of prizes) came to the hammer at Hanbury-hall, near Droitwich, on Wednesday the late Earl of Jersey's Southdowns at Stoney Middleton, near Bicester, and Mr. Pulbrook's improved Hampshire Downs at Hampton Manor Farm, near Andover; and on Thursday seventy of Mr. Dudley Paston's long-woolled Lincolnshire rams. The latter flock is one of the oldest in the county, and can show a seventy years' title to public favour.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

It is long since the St. Leger quotations have assumed anything like the importance they have done this year. Thormanby has recovered from his depression, and 3 to 1 would have been taken to money on Tuesday; while 4 to 1 was occasionally offered for Sweetmeats at 10 to 1. Buccaneer's "name is never heard," and both St. Albans and Wallace have their supporters; but speculation is by no means shy still it is seen how the Wizard (whose staying is naturally a moot point) gets through his York ordeal. It is said that Fisherman has been purchased by Mr. Baker for £2000, to accompany his Orlando Bridegroom and Rataplan. The Americans nibbled at him for some time, but they have left off.

Lichfield, Yarmouth, Exeter, Dover, and Weston Zoyland follow each other; but, as far as "the Derby" is concerned, the whole racing interest of next week is centralized on the Stockton meeting, which comes off on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. On Tuesday there are no less than 31 entries in the Cleveland Handicap, including Dictator, whose starting, we believe, depends entirely upon his York running. The Stockton Selling Stakes has 27 entries, including Sir William, High Treason, and Vanquisher; and the Tradesman's Handicap helps to make up a strong card. Sir William, Butterfly, Sutton, The Wizard, and Vanquisher are located are in the Stockton Cup. Leger on Wednesday; and the principal stake on Thursday is the Fourth Zetland Handicap, in the names of Dancer, Langcake, Lupus, Pollestone, Dictator, Kettledrum, and Matador. The latter is reported at Holmwood to have been highly tried with Bivouac, and 40 to 1 has been taken about him for the Derby.

The regattas of next week are as follow:—Hereford and Teignmouth on Monday; Conway, Starcross, and Dover (Prince's Pier on Wednesday; Tewkesbury on Thursday; Glasgow Royal and Broadstairs on Friday; and Glasgow Royal on Saturday.

Absinthe seems to be the opium of France. Its ravages are evident every day, but only amongst the poor. Its baleful influence is dangerous we for too much, but in every grade of society.

A serious incendiarism of the negroes was reported in the quadroon island of Louisiana, by several excitements among the merchants interested in the cane crops.

The Royal Library of Berlin has just purchased the whole of the music left by M. Fischoff, late professor at the Conservatoire at Vienna. The collection is composed of some 8000 pieces, by the best ancient and modern composers.

A letter from Bankfoot of the 12th inst. states that the Electric Light of Rose had been stopped, as the platinum of the battery, for some persons, who shunned him in the concert terms, accused him of breach of faith, and demanded £100 as compensation. The Court of Session decided in 1851. The Director was compelled to take refuge in a jeweller's shop.

ATTEMPT AT SUICIDE BY THE AGGRESSOR OF GARIBALDI.—No doubt be fresh in the recollection of our readers that the Rev. Mr. Price was formerly in charge of a chapel in Leicester Square, and that he was subsequently so embarrassed to obtain the release of his wife also. The latter was taken before the local authorities upon a serious charge, when she gave her husband to understand that she preferred remaining with the "brethren," and she consequently was discharged. At an early hour on Thursday morning Mr. Price accompanied by Joseph Reeves (a veterinary surgeon), William Furse (a tailor), and Thomas Cooper, proceeded to Hatfield, Hertfordshire, to consult Mr. Spaxton, for the purpose of rescuing by forcible means the lady in question. Mr. Price was put under the care of Mr. Spaxton, but he had the presence of mind to feigning his wife in one of the conservatories. He was on the point of entering her room when he fell down in a fit, and Mr. Spaxton then came to her assistance, and routed her husband and his companions.

APPEARANCE AND MANNERS OF GARIBALDI.—The following letter, we may remark, was addressed to a gentleman in this country, but with the purpose of offering his valuable medical services to aid of Garibaldi's wounded soldiers:—"Caprera, Wednesday, 4 o'clock in the morning.—"The evening of my arrival I was told that the Dictator was at his Farm, a few hours' distance from here, and that I should see him on his way to the expedition to Calabria. Being anxious to lose no time, I am about in search of a mule to go to the Farm, when I am told that the Dictator, who knows I want, was altogether out of the question. I obtained also only by the aid of the Americans, who lend me a mule and accompany me. I found him at last at the Farm at one o'clock in the morning, and presented myself to the General. He was on horseback, and I was introduced to him by Colonel Forbes. He received me very kindly—I may say affectionately. I heard about you," said he, "and am very much pleased to see you; we are very grateful to the kind English ladies who take such an interest in our cause." Whilst he was reading the letters of introduction I had with me, I had an opportunity of a minute focus to scrutinise this hero of modern history. His portrait in the illustrated London News is very good, but it cannot convey the idea of such a mild, placid countenance. He has rather the gentleness of a woman than the expression of a man. His manners are those of a lady. His whole body round him is full of anxiety, he is as cool as a cucumber. His dress is that of a sailor, with a red shirt under the coat, and a large hat of grey brocade, and a black widewake, a beautiful sword; no coat or blouse.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE unfavourable reports which have come to hand from various parts of the country as to the unsatisfactory appearance of the crops, and the delay the harvest work generally, and the prospect of heavy shipments of bullion to pay for foreign corn, have had the unfavourable effect of exercising a depressing influence upon the market for all Home Securities. The purchases of Stock, both for Money and Time, have been very limited; but up to yesterday there had been no increase to any extent; whilst the fluctuations in prices—though in some instances the tendency has been downwards—have not exceeded one-quarter per cent. The Unfunded Debt has further receded in price, and some of the bills have been sold at par.

As most parties are preparing for a higher range in the value of money—and the effect is deferred business in the commercial circles has become much restricted. The operations in goods imported from the Continent have greatly diminished, and the quantities on the Quays and in Warehouses are comparatively trifling. Out of the £250,000 received this week, upwards of £40,000 has been sent to the Bank of France, and £30,000 more is to go to-day. The ensuing feature, although, of course, a contracted trade must be regretted, is favourable to the Money Market. Bank has been able to lend freely, and the whole of our importations have been sold for France, Holland, and Germany.

There is a moderate, though not to say brisk, demand for discount accommodation, and the Bank rate of 3 per cent. Interest-street, none but the best paper is discounted, as the annexed quotations:—

Short Paper	...	...	4	Four Months'	...	...	4 to 4½
Bills at Call	...	...	4 to 4½	Good Bills	...	...	4½ to 5

In the Stock Exchange money is freely offered at from 2 to 2½ per cent on Government Securities.

Throughout the Continental capital is very abundant; but there is more inquiry for it than supply.

The high value of wool has led to the stoppage of two firms engaged in the woollen trade, and the failure of another has been announced.

The last steamer for India took out £321,923 in bullion, and several parcels of gold will be shipped to-day for the same destination.

We understand that a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent per annum will be declared at the Half-yearly Meeting of the Proprietors of the Australasian Bank. The amount to be carried forward is £10,194. A dividend at the rate of 12½ per cent per annum has been declared by the Union Bank of Australasia, and one of 4 per cent by the Southampton Dock Company. The Directors of the Australian Agricultural Company have declared a dividend.

Shares in the newly-formed companies have changed hands slowly. Ocean Marine Insurance have realised 3-16 to 5-16 premium; Crystal Palace, 1 to 1 pm.; Universal Marine Insurance, 3-16 to 5-16 prem.; London and Provincial Bank, 1 to 1¼ pm.; and Bank of Egypt, 1¼ to 1½ pm.

On Monday, the dealings in the Consol Market were much restricted. Prices, however, remained nearly the same as on Saturday. Reduced, Three per Cents Old to Account, 92¾ to 93; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 93¼; India Five per Cents, 101½; Ditto Four per Cents, 100; Exchequer Bills to 1s. 2d. pm.; India Five per Cent Rupee Paper was 96; Ditto, Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 103½. The Stock Exchange was closed yesterday and to-day for the customary five market.—Bank Stock left off at 223; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 93¼; Three per Cents, 1853 and 1858, 93¼; Three per Cents, Consols, 1885, 93¼; India Stock, 214; Ditto, New, 103¾; Ditto, Five per Cent Paper, 99; Ditto, Debentures, 101; Exchequer Bills, 1s. to 2s. pm. The Money Market rather drooping on the following day, and great inactivity prevailed generally:—Bank Stock was 223; India Stock, 214; Ditto, New, 103¾; Ditto, Five per Cent Enfaced Paper, 99¼ to 99; Ditto, Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 102; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 93¼; Ditto, Three per Cents, 1853 and 1858, 93¼; Exchequer Bill per Cents, 77; Exchequer Bills par to 3s. prem. On Thursday the market was heavy, and prices declined ¼ per cent, any change took place in the Consols for Money, were done at 92¾ to 93; Ditto for Account, 93 to 93¼; Reduced Three per Cents, 93¼; New Three per Cents, 93¼; India Stock, 213½; Bills par to 3s. prem. Bank Stock was 224½; India Stock, 213½; Ditto, Five per Cent Paper, 99; Ditto, New, 103¾.

The Foreign Market generally has been devoid of animation. The operations, both for Investment and Time, have continued unusually restricted. Indeed, no change of importance can be noticed in the quotations, compared with last week. Turkish Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1849, have realised 87½; Ditto Five per Cents, 100; Chilian Four-and-a-half per Cents, 83½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 61½; Dutch Four per Cents, 99¾; Mexican Three per Cents, 20½; Russian Five per Cents, 102½; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 94; Russian Three per Cents, 78; Spanish Three per Cents, 44½; Spanish Three per Cents, 44½; ditto New, Brazilian Five per Cents, 93½; Certificate of Coupon, not funded, 8½; Turkish Six per Cents, 1858, 103½; New, 6½; Portuguese Four per Cents, 1853, 44.

The dealings in Joint-stock Bank Shares have been tolerably numerous, and prices have undergone little alteration. Australasian have been marked 64½; Chartered of India, Australia, and China, 20½; Bank of Egypt, 2½ to 3; Ditto, Ex, 1½; British North American, 50½; Commercial of London, 20½; English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered, 14½; London and County, 36 ex div.; London Chartered of Australia, 23½; London Joint-stock, 23½; London and South African, 14; London and Westminster, 58; Manchester, Provincial of England, 38½; Oriental, 45½; Ottoman, 18½; Union of Australia, 52½; and Union of London, 26½.

Colonial Government Securities have ruled firm, as follows:—Canada Government Six per Cents, 1860, 104 ex dem.; January and July, 114; Ditto, March and September, 116; New South Wales Five per Cents, 1888 and upwards, 99½; and Victoria Six per Cents, 102½.

A very limited business has been transacted in Miscellaneous Securities. Crystal Palace Shares have realised 1 to 1 pm.; General Steam, 2¼; Red Sea and India Telegraph, 18¾ ex div.; South Australian Land, 34; Australian Agricultural Company, 41½; Electric and International Works, 6½; Port Mahon Mines, 4½; Van Diemen's Land, 9½.

The Railway Share Market has been somewhat flat. Prices, however, have not given way to any extent. The dividend on the stock of South Eastern has been announced at 4½ per cent per annum against 4 per cent at the corresponding period in 1859. The London and North-Western Dividend is to be at the rate of £3313; the Great Northern, an increase of £220; and the London and South-Western, an increase of £2776, when compared with the corresponding week in 1859. Annexed is Mr. Glyn's official closing quotations:—

ORDINARY STOCKS AND SHARES.—Caledonian, 94; Cork and Bandon, 18½; Cork, Blackrock, and Passage, 10½; Cornwall, ½; Eastern Counties, 8½; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 93½; Great Northern, A Stock, 101½; Ditto, B Stock, 105½; Great Western, 74½; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 104½ ex div.; London and Blackwall, 63 ex div. and ex New; London and Brighton, 104½; London, Chatham, and Dover, 47½; London and North-Western, 102½; London and South-Western, 91½; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, 43½; Midland, 121½ ex div. and ex New; North British, 54½; North Staffordshire, 9½; ex div.; Ditto, York, 81½ ex. div.; Scottish North-Eastern—Aberdeen Stock, 123½; South-Eastern, 88½; Stockton and Darlington, 8½; Vale of Neath, 96½; and Wolverhampton—Oxford, 40.

PREFERENCE SHARES.—East Anglian, Class C, Seven per Cent, 1863; Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee, 77½; Great Northern, Five per Cent Guaranteed, 130 (ex per cent prem.), 129½; Ditto (at 5 per cent prem.), 88; Great Western, Birmingham and Oxford, 50½; Ditto, Shrewsbury and Chester, 13½; Ditto, Shrewsbury and Hereford, 5½; South-Eastern, Fixed Four-and-a-Half per Cent, 103½; Ditto, Four per Cent, 100½; and Ditto, Three per Cent, 84½.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (August 20).—There was a very poor show of English, wheat in the dog's market, and the demand for both red and white qualities ruled steady. Extra wheats were taken at 50s. per qr. Foreign was in good request, at previous prices. Sample closed at 47s. Most descriptions of foreign wheat were quite in our quarter kinds, and there was an increased demand for them. Barley was in fair request, at 34s. per qr. Malting qualities were in good request, at 36s. per qr. Beans were in good request, at 34s. per qr. Peas were in good request, at previous rates. Oats were in fair request, at 24s. per qr. Linseed was in good request, at 54s. per qr. Cakes were in fair request, at £5 10s. per ton. Flour was in good request, at 30s. per sack.

THE PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, QUEBEC, THE OFFICIAL RESIDENCE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES DURING HIS STAY IN QUEBEC.

THE Prince of Wales, according to the programme issued of his Royal Highness's movements, was to arrive at Quebec on the 18th inst., taking up his official abode at the Parliament Buildings, where he would receive deputations and hold levées during his stay at Quebec. The Parliament Houses provided accommodation for thirty, exclusive of servants. Two separate dining-rooms, one capable of dining twenty-five, and the other fifty persons, were prepared. There were also proper offices for the Lord Chamberlain. The above Engraving is from a drawing recently taken by G. H. Andrews, our Special Artist

On page 175 we give a View from the King's Bastion, Quebec, sketched by Major Williams, R.A. The Isle of Orleans, shown in the distance in this Engraving, is in the St. Lawrence River, and is about twenty miles in length, and six miles at its greatest breadth. In subsequent Numbers we shall give further Illustrations of Quebec, accompanied by a full description of this stronghold of military power.

THE NIAGARA ABOVE THE FALLS.—BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST G. H. ANDREWS.

LITERATURE AND ART.

THE majority of melodramas conclude with a blaze of blue fire; and whenever poor old Vauxhall "closed for ever"—an event which happened on the average about once in every year—was always amidst the radiance of "fifty thousand additional lamps." The wire-drawn Session of 1860 threatens to end in a fiery blaze of squabbles about art. Seldom since the day when the monk Savonarola made a bonfire of the Florentine "vanities" at the foot of the Loggia di Lanzi, burning indiscriminately Boccaccio's novels, naughty books, and Fra Bartolomeo's drawings from the nude (how pleased Lord Hoddy would have been at the spectacle!), have there been such an artistic conflagration as has been raging lately in the House of Commons. Only the fire has been one of opinions, not of actual works of art. First, Mr. Charles Kinglake has been raging against the Elgin Marbles. Mr. Herbert, his frescoes, and the six thousand pounds he is to get for them, have come to talk their Gaelic Prose, his "Morte" at Brompton, and the designs he meditates on the National Gallery, are censured. Mr. Conyngham's onslaught on the pseudo-Titian Arundel portrait has created sport. On Saturday last there was a grand fight in the Commons relative to the National Gallery, which, although at the "Top and Bottom of the Season" and in the "plenitude of a House," brought out Mr. Coningham in an elaborate art-lecture, and Lord Palmerston in a caustic speech about things in general, and art in particular. The gist of the contest was that the Government wanted £15,000 to bridge over the great yawning chasm between the premises of the National Gallery and those of the Royal Academy in the central hall of Mr. Wilkins's building. Nature and art alike abhor this vacuum, and the space thus made available will be converted into spacious saloons on the upper and lower "decks" of the edifice for the exhibition of paintings and sculpture for which room cannot now can be found. After a sharp fight the Government gained their point, and got their £15,000, but only by a majority of eight. They at least deserve credit for economy in thus resolving to bridge-over that project, which reminds us of the frugal Hollanders when they drained the Lake of Haarlem and saved enough money thereby to pay for the mud had been before.

And how about the Royal Academy? Are they to go or to stay in Trafalgar-square in sweula sæculorum? When are those visionary premises at Burlington House to be erected out of the private coffers of the wealthy forty? An Irish orator once declared that the public element is eliminated from the Academy, and new blood is infused into this select corporation." Touching this National Gallery controversy in its entirety, we are of the opinion of the sage who declared that there is much to be said on both sides"; and, whether we are by no means admirers of fierce quarrels, there is some room for gratulation in the fact that Governments and Opposition take so much interest in matters connected with art. Time was when they did not so neglect.

Has any one remarked the great similarity that exists between the "spiritual question" and one of those "running-down cases" that are sometimes tried in courts of law?—we mean as regards the heats wearing on either side. You know that there are two "parties" on the part of the plaintiff or the defendant, yet how are you to distinguish them? Is the one that C. D. who is always crying out for peace, and how are you to accuse C. D., who is your intimate friend, and is a model of tenderness, of false swearing in the witness-box? Or was at no time within twenty-five feet of A. B.'s vehicle? So with spiritualism. "I saw Mr. Jones floating in the air (swears A. B.); I saw the lady's valuable dance a fandango"; but Mr. Jones's acquaintance sing a comic song. Whereupon up starts C. D., and categorically denies every one of A. B.'s assertions. "I was there, and can tell the tale the tale" Nothing, certainly, in a "running-down case" can equal this conflict of evidence. Personally we don't believe that Mr. Jones in the air, nor in Mr. Home anywhere; but, as common with most persons, we have many esteemed and valued friends who are staunch believers in spiritualism. The article in the Cornhill number must have been a great joy and comfort to them; and now they are promised further light and manna in the shape of the Rev. Baptist Noel's fight edition of Mr. Robert Dale Owen's "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World." May this highly-priestly work be the means of converting the Sceptical! For ourselves we have seen no spirits ourselves, and have no desire for further intercourse with spirits.

Mr. Wilkie Collins's highly powerful romance of "The Woman in White" has been concluded in the columns of All the Year Round, and now we have the one-volume guise, clean and unsullied by those myriad adherents. In a characteristic preface Mr. Collins begs the critics not to forestall public interest in his work by "telling the story at second hand" to, Mr. Collins! Why, you have somehow managed the reticence of the reduced gentlewoman who cried "Hearthstones!" in a back street and a weak voice, and "hoped nobody would tell her." So we dine with the Lord Mayor we are to go into disquisitions on the archipelago features of the Mansion House, give a complete history of the Pyramids in connection with the Egyptian Hall, and write the lives of the Lord Mayor's footman, and say never a word about the turtle and the port, the champagne and the cigars we have had for dinner? We "obtemperate" Mr. Wilkie Collins's request in this place, as we cannot compass a sketch of the queer, quaint, eccentric a thousand pages in narration into the twentieth part of a column of this Journal; but the clever author of "The Woman in White" must not think to escape diagnosis at the hands of the critics. We shall have the armadillo next deprecating description by the showman outside the booth. "The Woman in White" is an admirable fiction, and will be none the worse for the sponsjs of the gentlemen who "cut the lions and mull the paper-stuffs."

"Captain Brand of the Centipede, a Pirate of Eminence in the West Indies:" such is the terrific title of a work from the pen of Lieutenant-Wise, of the United States Navy, and now one of Routledge's publications. Who was Captain Brand? Was he really a marauder, or only a myth? Did he ever walk the quarter-deck? Was he an admirable fiction, and had that famous shock-headed buccaneer of whom it is sung—

Off Sable Island shall not to me
Up with the black flag and down with the blue:
Fire on the master and fire on the boat,
Fire on the sailors and fire on the bow."

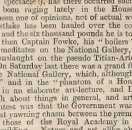
Ruthless Captain Roughhead! After all, "Captain Brand of the Centipede" is a real character, and has left behind him a reputation for activity and mystery the renowned Yankee pirate of the Chinese seas Sir Graham Moore, Lord Colchester, Duke Alexander of Russia, Cochin China, and who prosecuted, we believe, by Mr. Chisholm Anstey when Attorney-General at Hong-Kong?

A museum at South Kensington. And why not? Mr. Roupell, the kindly and liberal Croesus of the transpontine districts, with an influential deputation, has been pressing the Government with explanations of a scheme for a museum "over the water." We think that a museum of practic or scientific, in preference to artistic objects, would be productive of much benefit to the trasteverini. The zoological collection at the Surrey Gardens exist no longer; Sydenham is too far off; and the occasional yearnings of the denizens of the Borough and Westminster roads require something else beyond Canterbury Hall and a night with Leotard. The natural sciences would be appreciated better.

In foreign literature we find that the philological firm of Trübner have in preparation a Russian work on the "Raskolniks," or Schismatics from the Orthodox Greek Church of Russia, a sect who number nearly three millions of souls, and who have embraced all the rich peasant proprietors. They separated from the Church about the same period as that at which our own Puritans were born (circa head—1666, and were exposed to cruel persecution until Catherine II. recognised them in 1762, and allowed them a limited freedom of action. The history of the "Raskolniks" is totally unknown in Western Europe, and cannot fail to open up a most interesting chapter to the curious in Christian sects.

The personal effects of Alexander von Humboldt are to be sold by auction at Berlin in the middle of next month. They comprise oil and water colour paintings, lithographs, engravings, and one hundred and sixty diplomas from divers academies, signed by such celebrities as Frederick William III., the Czar Nicholas, Prince Metternich, Sir David Brewster, King Oscar of Sweden, Baron Cuvier, Prince Ouvaroff, and Sir Joseph Banks. The lion of the collection is the colossal bust of Humboldt by David d'Angers, a present from the sculptor to the savant. Of course, moreover, medals, numismatic collections, and all Humboldt's mathematical instruments and scientific apparatus, together with the beautiful writing-desk, inkstand, pens, &c., used by the great philosopher in writing "Cosmos."

CHESS.



TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Our customary Notices to Correspondents are unavoidably deferred.

THE CHESSMEN MEETING OF THE BRITISH CHESS ASSOCIATION.—The Chess Association, of which a few members have already been enrolled since the commencement of this month, has now been established some years. The main objects which the original promoters appear to have had in view were the cultivation of a taste for chess, the improvement of the game, the formation of a library, and that which is the theory and practice of the game, and the formation and strengthening of the social relations between theexplayers of the United Kingdom. The Chess Association has been established on a very large and much good; but, to develop the full measure of its utility, some changes in the constitution are indispensable. For example, the committee should be permanent; not, in place of it, an honorary secretary, a paid officer, should be appointed, who should be alone to be engaged. These improvements, if carried out, would not involve much outlay to each individual member of the body, all of whom are interested in the support of the game as an intellectual pastime, and would materially tend to the advancement of chess, and may remind the gentlemen who have undertaken, at much trouble and some cost, the management of the Association, that the time has arrived when they should call a meeting of the members for the purpose of considering the best means of placing the Association on a permanent basis, and so as to secure for the most solid and lasting benefits upon the chess fraternity. Gentlemen who are already members of the society are invited to send in their views, and may send forward their suscriptions immediately to Mr. Lucas, Esq., M.A., Trinity Coll., Cambridge.

PROBLEM No. 862.
By Mr. S. LOYD.

BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in four moves.

CHESS IN LONDON.
A well-fought Game between Mr. BIRD and Mr. E. THOROLD, of the Newcastle Chess Club.

(K's Kt's Opening.)

WHITE (Mr. E. T.)	BLACK (Mr. B.)

2. K Kt to B 3rd	P to Q 4th
3. Kt takes K P	B to Q 3rd
4. Kt takes B P	P takes P

(White gains four Pawns for the Kt, and a strong attack into the bargain, so that he does not scruple much by this violence.)

5. Q to K B 4th (ch)	P to K Kt 3rd
6. Q takes Q P (ch)	B to K 2nd
7. Q takes Q Kt P	Q Kt to Q 2nd
8. P to K 5th	Kt to K Kt 1st
9. Q Kt to B 3rd	K Kt to K 2nd

(This was inexpertly called for, since Black could even bring out his Queen's Kt to Q B sq.)

25. P to Q 6th	B takes K P
26. Q takes Kt (ch)	K to K 2nd
27. P to K 7th	Resigns

BERLINER SCHACH-ERINNERUNGEN, NEBST DEN SPIELEN DIE GEGEN END LUDERA. Von Hermassgeber des "Von Bilgenreichen Handbuches." Leipsic: Last and Son.

This work, in every respect creditable to its distinguished author, is principally designed as a memorial of the most interesting and important epoch in the annals of German chess—the period immediately anterior to the publication of Mr. Staunton's "Chess Player's Handbook." In this volume are the memoirs there had been no illustrious school of chessplayers in Berlin; and the warmly lauded, almost as a popular hero, with the whole population of Mendhelm. But all at once there shone forth, not a bright particular star, but a constellation of stars. Simply, it was the concentration and consolidation of chess talent and skill as assembled in the Blumengarten about the year 1837-41, when Bledow, Mayet, Schulten, Heydebrand, and the present author of the present work, Mr. Heydebrand von der Lasa, were in the habit of congregating in that celebrated coffee-house. Bledow was the most formidable rival to his friendly competitors in the golden age of his chess experience, a somewhat later period, Schulten, Mayet, and Lasa were the first in the respective order of merit. Heydebrand, however, was then only a second-rate player, but of high promise, and has since risen to the first rank. Of these two authors Bledow was very much the more accomplished player yet diligent student, the unvarying correspondent, the profound and unwearied analyst of the game. He was very experienced, and the treasures of his book lore to the confusion yet admiration of many a younger and more vigorous opponent. It is to be regretted that the author has not entered as fully into details regarding two other of his compeers, the accomplished and gifted Bilguer, and the unfortunate Mayet, whose games are estimated in this country as among the choicest products of the German school. Of these two authors but scanty notices are very meagre. Unfortunately, the sketches are supplemented by many agreeable descriptions of the intercourse and mutual relations of the brotherhood. They afford, too, reminiscences of the play as well as of the players, and these form a contribution to what may be termed the secret history of the "Handbuch;" showing how much the value of that remarkable work depended on the assiduity and skill with which the various openings were tested by actual conflict.

The second portion of the book before us is devoted to the games of Greco, the Calabrian, and a reprint of the ancient treatise by Lucena, accompanied by many important and critical observations. We have not space to enter on a detailed examination of the merits of the present literary labours. Our impression is that, though the subtleties of the brilliant Calabrian will be found more attractive than profitable to the modern student, the latter chapters are calculated rather for the archæologist than for the ordinary lover of chess.

GARIBALDI'S EXPEDITIONS TO THE MAIN LAND.

THE accounts, at first vague and contradictory, of divers expeditions by Garibaldi's forces from the north-easternmost point of Sicily to the opposite shore have at length assumed a definite form, and, by the aid of "our own Correspondents" on the spot, can now be read aright. Some of these attempts were, very likely, merely tentative, and others, perhaps, diversions, to draw off the enemy's attention and forces from the point where the serious blow is intended to be dealt. All things point clearly enough to a rally-approaching crisis, and it is highly probable that by our foreign news of this week's Number will contain an account of another great victory for Garibaldi or of a terrible defeat. Meanwhile, here are our attention to those lesser and earlier expeditions intended to clear the way for the final spring, we annex some particulars relating to the two which appear in last month's Number, as sketches by our Special Artist in Sicily.

DEPARTURE OF MISSORI'S EXPEDITION TO SURPRISE THE TORRE CAVALLO FORT, CALABRIA.

On the night of the 8th instant, at nine o'clock (writes our Special Artist), our Correspondent respecting the Italian affairs on page 184, the expedition under the command of Major Missori, numbering about 200 men, left the Faro Point in small fishing-boats, under the cover of the fire of the City of Aberdeen steamer, which drove off a Neapolitan gunboat that was firing upon the boats. Missori had promised to give me a place in his boat, or that his lieutenant, in the hurry of departure, would remember him. While the last barque was in the act of pushing off I sprang at it, in the hope of being taken in; but the Major meant to see me save me the butt-end of his rifle in the chest, accompanying it, at the same time, with an apology that the boat was full, and could not take me. The consequence of the practical refusal to admit me was to turn me into the water up to the waist—a very pleasant condition in which to pass the night. That night, also, took the opportunity to make the attempt here a mile and a half wide—missed his way, and landed them considerably below the Torre del Cavallo. And so, instead of one unwatching picket, who fired their muskets and fell back on the fortress. In two or three minutes after a cannon was fired from the walls in the direction of the boats; but Missori's men, taking advantage of attempting an attack now that all were on the alert, made for the hills up the direct bed of a mountain torrent, and so escaped the Neapolitan populations, and forming them into organised bands. The City of Aberdeen and two other steamers had their decks cleared for action that night, and the Major never would attempt the passage if the former were unsuccessful, I went on board one of them, but was disappointed in my expectations of the best continuous scene during the night. A Swiss regiment volunteered at four the next morning to go on a reconnaissance with me, but nothing could be seen from the deck of the steamer; but on approaching the coast they were fired on by the Neapolitan troops, who, to the number of three thousand, were drawn up in readiness to oppose a landing. But if the Major's men were to have a rifle-ball through the thigh. Later in the day a spy came across with the intelligence that Missori had got safely into the hills, and was recruiting rapidly.

GARIBALDIAN TROOPS PREPARING TO EMBARK AT THE FARO POINT FOR CALABRIA.

Our Special Artist and Correspondent in Sicily writes on Saturday evening, the 11th instant, from Faro Point, as follows respecting the illustration on page 185 which refers to him, for the first time in the present Number:—"In another half hour it is probable I shall be off with the men from the point. For three nights I have been lying in the sand amongst guns and ammunition, expecting to go over; but the seven Italian steamers chosen for carrying out the expedition have made it impossible for us to pass. They, in addition to the numerous troops and forts along the coast, would make our reception in Calabria rather too far to do. Two of these steamers are shown in the Sketch moving slowly on either side of the Sicilia rock. There are more lower down. Before every steamer to be towed is a boat, as it is dark enough we shall make a dash across in dispute of everything. Letters received from Missori to-day give favourable accounts of his position. He is perfectly safe in the mountains, and his force is increasing hourly. It is to be hoped that the Calabrians will prove truer than on former occasions. There goes a steamer from amongst the rocks of hills on the other side! It is a signal from Missori that he is ready to attack the Neapolitans in the rear, while we draw their attention here. I close my envelope, as the person who takes this into Messina for to-morrow's mail is now leaving."

GARIBALDI TO THE WOMEN OF SICILY.

According to a letter in the Presse, the wand of self-reliance and preserving energy of the people of Sicily has occasioned Garibaldi considerable discontent, and has led him to appeal to the women in the following proclamation :—

"TO THE WOMEN OF SICILY.

"Liberty! the most precious gift of Providence to peoples, has been gained for Sicily, thanks to the heroic resolution of the people, the valour and devotion and of their brethren of the continent. Liberty, difficult to gain, is more difficult to keep. The flag for ages resplendent in the midst of the tempest of the country that there is no need in her case to recur to foreign histories to find examples of kinds of victims, and the women of Sicily have in all times displayed a courage which has astonished the world. From the women of Syracuse, who, at their tender breast to succour the sick and the wounded day, to those of Messina, who encouraged their relatives to attack a bombarding fleet, there are hundreds of this sex in the island of the Three Capes, who no event unparalleled in the history of nations, saw the fair islanders fighting by the side of their husbands for national independence.

"I myself (I recall the occasion with exultation), in denouncing from the Palace of Montecitorio at Rome the perfidious people that betrayed me to a foreign tyrant, heard a groaning repeated by the women who crowded the balconies, deep enough to make an army pass, and that groaning was the condemnation of tyranny.

"Sicily is free, it is true; a single citadel alone remains in the power of the enemy; but eleven years ago Sicilian valour achieved the same result; and yet this time the foreigner, with less numerous forces, and with better fleets, has less slavery, was sodden once more under mercenary fist, and brought in a state of siege, which is the most odious of tyrannies, and which, by the suspension of civil guarantees, places at the mercy of the soldiery the property of which he is loaned by the affection of his whole life. He asks of you nothing for himself; nothing for others: for the country he asks your blood and your powerful assistance. Call to arms the inhabitants of this island, and shout those who have a son or a mother's or sweetheart's arms—Fly!

"La Calcili, of Paria, a rich, noble, and beloved matron, had four sons. One died in battle on the body of his mother, and the other three, all decorated, Benedetto, you have at Palermo, scarred with the wounds he received at Calatafimi and at Palermo; the third, Rosolino Pilo, fell at Gaeta, and was split open in those battles; and the fourth has been sent to join the same army by that immortal mother. Sicilian women, you have given proofs of virtues, but this struggle will be long and deadful, and full of danger for all. Many—the shall survive the battles—will be maimed, and you will have the care of twenty generations of Italians; and I shall restore to you your dear ones, formed by the battlefield, covered with glory, and worthy companions for your powerful assistance. Call to arms the inhabitants of this island, and shout those who have a son or a mother's or sweetheart's arms—Fly!

MR. COBDEN AND THE FRENCH TREATY.—The following extract from a private letter, dated August 15, addressed by Mr. Cobden to a friend, has been communicated to the Times:—"I arrived on Friday morning. I have still no reason to doubt that matters will be brought to a satisfactory issue here. To the Emperor personally I have experienced nothing but candour and straightforwardness in my dealings with the French Government, while all the underplotting, falsehood, and artifices which I have had to encounter have come from the English side of the Channel. Nothing can be more clear than the course which I have taken on principle in our own politicians. 'Anything for a momentary cry which may give a temporary political support to the Ministry.' That is the motive of most men. You will see that in less than a couple of years all our politicians will be agreeing to what the merit of having first proposed will belong to the French treaty. The paragraph you inclosed, giving a conversation of mine, is one of those complete acts of eavesdropping which I have experienced when writers are so notorious. There is a good deal of the paragraph which agrees with what I said, but there is not whatever I expressed to private persons. Still in more than I could swear to, as no one expects to be made responsible for what is reported. There ought to be the punishment of the pillory or the stocks for those who publish in newspapers the unguarded remarks which fall from a friend in private conversation, when he fearlessly speaks merely to provoke a reply. I always ought to begin by saying how delicious is the interchange of views. No; I will not use the Emperor to prepare his pamphlet about the English and French navies and armies. To me my word for it, however, that there is a vast deal of sentiment lying in England for the French armaments. You remember that charming old lady, Miss Wolley's landlady, whom we visited, who remarked—'Pauvre John Bull quand on veut enlever son argent, on lui fait peur de nous!' I am ashamed of the childlike simplicity with which Englishmen allow themselves to be imposed upon respecting anything French. You will see a great and sudden reaction in the public mind soon. Common sense, aided by the publication of the new French tariff, will put an end to the panic."

Relics of the Past.

MANUSCRIPT BOOK OF PRAYERS PRESENTED BY CARDINAL WOLSEY TO HENRY VIII.

AMONG the diversity of offerings which it was customary for the nobility and gentry to present on the New Year, on certain occasions, a book was always considered to be one of the most appropriate, and the public libraries of Europe contain many examples of this favourable oblation. The library of the British Museum in particular possesses two very remarkable presents of the kind—the largest and the smallest manuscript volumes ever offered to Royalty. One of these is the massive collection of French romances presented by the valiant John Talbot, first of Shrewsbury, to Queen Margaret of Anjou; and the other the exquisite bijou engraved above, which was a gift of the magnificent Wolsey to King Henry VIII. This diminutive MS. not more than an inch and a half long, by three-quarters of an inch in breadth, contains all the ordinary prayers, in Latin, of the Romish Church, elegantly written in a manner but legible character of twelve lines to a page, upon seventy-four leaves of spotless vellum. The initial letters and letters are of gold—the former upon a delicate blue ground, and the end of every verse and prayer has an illuminated finial; while a tenuous, threadlike border, looped in the middle of each margin, encircles every page. In addition to this ornamentation there are eight miniatures, which add much to the richness of the manuscript. The subjects of these miniatures are those usually selected for works of this description—namely, the Four Evangelists, the Crucifixion, King David, St. George, and St. Anthony. They are painted within a sort of architectural framework of gold, shaded with vermilion, and are executed with peculiar finish. The great value of this book, however, consists chiefly in the beauty of the workmanship nor in its tiny proportions, but in two autograph notes, one written by the King and the other by Cardinal Wolsey, towards the end of the prayers. The prayer to St. George begins on the recto of folio 70, opposite to the miniature of that saint, and terminates on the reverse of folio 71. The first page, which was probably left blank for the purpose, contains the following inscription in King Henry's hand :—

FACSIMILE OF THE WRITING CARDINAL WOLSEY.

FACSIMILE OF THE WRITING KING HENRY VIII.

"En prian a Sainte Gorge nobleie point le toute vre.—H. R." On the succeeding page (73) we have the miniature of St. Anthony, followed by the prayer to that holy personage at page 74; and on the reverse of this last page the Cardinal has written :—"En priant a St. Anthione vre pluis Souvenir de loy qu [i] est et sera vre cratee.—T. Wolsey."

Until the last few years this polite rarity has lain quite hidden from public inspection, to which it was first introduced in 1845 by the brief notice in the Ayscough Catalogue of Sloane MSS. "Liber Precum. In perg. sec. xvi. (this book is about an inch long)," referred to one of the most curious and interesting relics in the national collection. Thanks to Sir Frederic Madden, the Keeper of Manuscripts in the British Museum, the volume is now enclosed in a handsome case of rich incasing of Gothic silver-gilt framework, and is accessible to every one, under proper regulations, who expresses a wish to see it.

AN INEDITED LETTER OF DEAN SWIFT.—A correspondent, who possesses the original of the following unpublished letter from Swift, sends us a copy, in the belief that it has hitherto escaped publication :—

"My Lord,—Your Grace fairly owes me £110 a year in the Church, which I thus prove : I desired you would bestow a preferment of £100 a year to a certain clergyman. I have since got another, and asked nothing, which you would not promise, but you would grant my request. However, for want of good intelligence in being (after a court word used by an expert Christian, that clergyman is come up with £9 a year, and I shall never trouble your Grace any more on his behalf. Now, by plain arithmetic, it follows that £110 remains due to the arrear I have assigned to one Mr. John Jackson, a cousin-german of the Grattans, who is Vicar of Santry, and hath a small estate, which, I hear, is settled on his daughters, and given to them hath layn some years as a weight upon me, which I voluntarily take off. I have not seen him these two years, and scarce once almost to a fault. Your Grace is now disposing the debris of two bishoprics, and, as I am told, the deanery of Down, worth between £600 and £100 a year, which will make this gentleman easier, who besides his other good qualities, is as loyal as you could wish. I cannot but think that your Grace's word hath given very great satisfaction, and be bound when you have satisfyed all the expectations of those who have applyed to you for favours, that your Grace will then be more to you by persons of weight; but I easily found by your general behaviour that you have no mind to be troubled with importunity, I silence me by diverting the discourse, which made me reflect that courtiers and ministers are like the Grand Signior, who is ashamed to be called. And [name illegible] one of them assured me that he had lost £14,000 since he left off play, merely by dabbling with those who had more experience than himself.

"My Lord, I will, as a divine, quote Scripture :—'Although the children's bread should not be given to dogs, yet the dogs eat the scraps that fall from the children's tables.' This is the second request I have ever made you; the first was for Dr. Jackson, who desired to live on his own small estate, part whereof is in his parish, about four miles from hence, where he hath built a family house more expensive than he intended. He is a clergyman of long standing, and of a most unblemished character; but the misfortune is that he hath not one enemy, to whom I might appeal for the truth of what I say. Pray, my Lord, be not alarmed at the word deanery, nor imagine it is dignity like what we have in England : for, except three or four, the rest have little power, rather none at Down and Chapter, and seldom any land at all. It is usually a living consisting of one or more parishes, some very poor, and others better endowed, but all to tythes. Mr. Jackson cannot leave his present situation, and only desires some very moderate addition. My Lord, I do not deceive your Grace when I say you will oblige great numbers even of those who are most at your decision by conferring this favor or any other that will answer the same end. Multa—vestis manus, auxilio quæ—sit (nihil, (nam multo plures sumus) ac veluti te Judei cognoma in hanc deorbre turbam).

"I would have waited on your Grace, and taken the priviledge of my usual thirteen minutes if I had not been prevented by my old disorder in my head, for which I have been forced to confine myself to the precepts of my physician.—JONAT. SWIFT."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE GRAND DUCHESS ANNE OF RUSSIA.

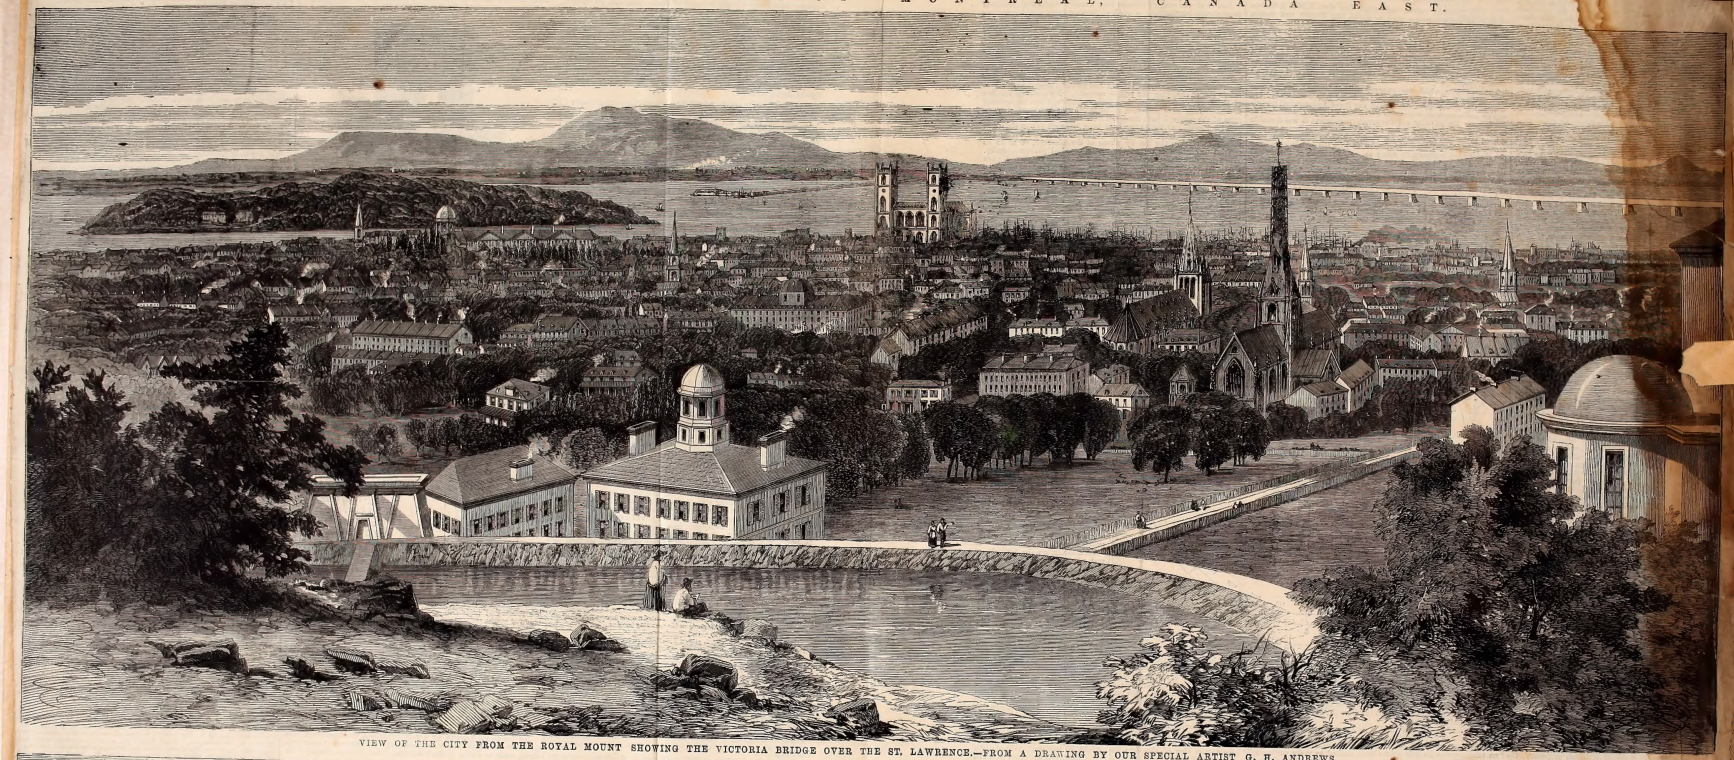
HER Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Anne Feodorowna of Russia, eldest Princess Royal of Wurtemberg, Duchess of Teck, Duchess of Saxony, Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, was sister of the Duchess of Kent and aunt of her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain. Her Imperial Highness Princess was the eldest daughter of Francis, Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha by his Consort, Augusta, daughter of Augustus, Duke of Saxe-Gotha-Altenburg, and was born on the 21st of September, 1781, and was married, on the 26th of February, 1798, to the Grand Duke Nicholas, the elder brother of the late Emperor Nicholas. This union proved unhappy, the Grand Duke Constantine was disappointed in not having a family, and neglect was resented in concert with indifference. He ultimately obtained a legal separation from her on the 20th of March, 1820, and previously, in January of the same year, resigned his pretensions to the throne of Russia. The Grand Duke subsequently formed a matrimonial union with Antonia Grudzinska, a person in humble life, after-wards Princess Lowicz. He died on the 27th of June, 1831. The Grand Duchess, having retired into private life, took place only when the rank of the Grand Duke, retired into dignified privacy, and nearly sought society, even among the members of her own family. Her Imperial Highness died on the 14th inst., at her seat, Eifenau, near Berne, in Switzerland.

LADY SMYTHE.

Frances Dowager Lady Smythe was the only daughter of Sir Edward Bellew-sixth Baronet of Barmeath, in the county of Louth, by his wife, Mary Anne-daughter and heir of Sir Robert Barnewall, Bart., of Turvey, in the county of Kilkenny, and was the sister of Patrick, present Lord Bellew. She was married the first of February, 1809, to Sir Edward Smythe, fifth Baronet, of Ess Hill, in the county of Durham, who died the 11th of March, 1836, and had issue by him Sir Edward Smythe, sixth Baronet, now living, of whom are married, viz.—Mrs. Arthur James Notterville, and Mrs. Blundell, and a daughter married to Lord Lamington. Lady Smythe, whose death we note in the present list Charles Frederick Smythe, Bart. Lady Smythe died on the 17th inst., at one of her seats, Ess Hill, Warwickshire.

JOSEPH ARMITAGE, ESQ.

Joseph Armitage, Esq., of Birkby Lodge, formerly of (since his son's) Milnsbridge House, Huddersfield, in the county of York, a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the West Riding, was the son of Joseph Armitage, Esq., of Highroyd House, by his wife Sarah, daughter of Joseph Walker, Esq., of Lascelles Hall, near Huddersfield, in the West Riding. He married, the 26th of September, 1804, Anne, eldest daughter of Joseph Taylor, Esq., of Birkby Lodge, by his wife Mary, daughter of John Hall, Esq., and died the 1st of February, 1854, had six sons and nine daughters. Of the latter, the six surviving are married, viz.—Mrs. Joseph Walker, of Bank House, Leeds; Mrs. Wilcock of the Rev. Dr. James; Charlotte, wife of William Leigh Brook, Esq.; Mary, wife of the Rev. Joseph Armitage Hirst; Caroline, wife of Christopher Sandford, Esq.; and Emily, wife of W. L. Brook. Mr. Joseph Armitage died on the 17th inst., at his residence, and was interred on the 21st, attended by his eldest son, George Armitage, Esq., already of Milnsbridge House, born the 24th of January, 1805, who has married Emily Anne, eldest daughter of James Dewhirst, Esq., of North Dalton, Yorkshire, and is a magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant for the West Riding.



REMOVAL OF THE EAST INDIA BOARD.—The work of removing from the India House, Leadenhall-street, to the Commission, will commence on the 1st of September. The rent to be paid for the portion of the house to be occupied by the Board will be £2000, in addition to the half of the rates and taxes. In consequence of recent alterations in the Government of India, the accommodation which at present the Board enjoys will not formerly the case. The transfer of the accounts to the Bank of England, and the payment of the dividends by that establishment, has rendered necessary a large portion of the accountant and audit office. The amalgamation of the Indian with the Home Office has transferred to the latter establishment the Home Guards, and the management of the small Indian navy will in future be carried on by the Admiralty. The Board, however, will have more to do as what is intended with respect to the museum.

THE CORPORATION LIBRARY.—The library of the Corporation was instituted in the year 1824, and now contains an aggregate of four thousand volumes. It is open to the public from ten o'clock every day on Sundays, Good Friday, Christmas Day, and days appointed for fasts and thanksgivings. It is closed for the whole of September, and during the month of August, and from the 6th to the 19th of November. Every member of the Court of Corporation has the privilege of admission, and the privilege of introducing a visitor, either personally or by letter. The rules observed in regard to the use of books are similar to those in regular force in connection with the British Museum, and have for their only object the comfort of the frequenters of the library and the preservation of the property. The whole of the books of the library is selected for circulation among the members of the Corporation, and from the circumstance of its possessing the Royal and corporate libraries in, in this particular, departed from.—City Press.

VOLCANIC ERUPTION IN ICELAND.—A correspondent of the Svenska Morgonbladet writes from Reykjavik, that Kiödgia volcano, the most celebrated Icelandic mountains :—"This jokul, or glacier-covered mountain, a square part of the island, which has remained quiet for a very long period—which stretch in a direction from east to west, or rather from north-east to south-west, and which is surrounded by the Atlantic Ocean on the coast of Iceland. Their average elevation is 3000 feet. They include Mount Myrdals-jokul, which, in 1755, was the scene of a volcanic eruption in Iceland since that of Recia in 1846. The present is the fifteenth eruption from Kiödgia. The first eruption took place in 1612. The fifteenth eruption began on the 8th of May last, and continued till about the end of June. The present eruption is more violent than the eruption of Icelandic volcanoes—with local earthquakes; and the first signal of its advent was given by the rising of the waters which rested on the summit of the mountain. Vivid flames and a column of smoke or steam, sometimes 24,000 feet high, were continually to be seen. On the 8th and 9th of May, in Reykavik, which is at least eighty miles off. Ashes, pumice, and sulphur covered the ground. The inhabitants of the district in the vicinity of the eruption was the ejection of enormous quantities of hot water, which rushed to the sea in torrents of boiling water. These torrents, pouring with force to the sea, twenty miles distant, huge pieces of ice, the size of which latter volcanoes have been seen to eject stones of the size of a house. Happily the eruption has not been attended by any loss of life."

CORONATION OF THE KING AND QUEEN OF NORWAY.—A correspondent writes from Christiania :—"The solemn and splendid coronation of the King and Queen of Norway on Sunday, the 8th inst. The ceremony, according to the ancient Lutheran ritual, commenced with a sermon preached in the ancient cathedral of that city :—The King arrived on the 3rd from Stockholm, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Princes Oscar Frederick. According to precedent the Royal procession walked to the cathedral. The streets of the principal thoroughfares were lined with troops, the windows decked and covered with scarlet cloth; flue of infantry were ranged on each side, supported by squadrons of cavalry. At ten o'clock the procession left the palace in the following order:—Heralds, the King's Court Marshal with Staff, Marine and Military Staff, Aides-de-Camp, Marshals, Knights of the Order, Officers of the Household, Deputies from the University and Supreme Courts of Christiania, Bergen, Drontheim, Christiansand, Stavanger, and Tromsoe. The Royal mantle, globe, sceptre, and sword, upon velvet cushions, were borne respectively by General Adlercreutz, Count Bjelke, Count Brahe, Count Wachtmeister, and General Bloch; and the crown by the Chief Minister of State, his Excellency C. C. Hertzberg. The canopy was borne by the Bishop of Christiania, and was borne by superior officers and supremen, or Lords Lieutenant of provinces. The standard of Norway was borne by Count Gerner. Gentlemen of the Bed chamber officers. Next followed Prince Oscar and Prince Augustus, in the dress of the Norwegian Grenadiers, and the Crown Prince's son. The Royal mantle, sceptre, and crown were borne by General Scrensen, Minister of War, and Count Wedel Jarlsberg, Minister for Public Worship. Then the Archbishop. The Queen was supported by State Councillors Peterson and Bruun. Lastly, the Grand Marshal, Count Wedel Jarlsberg, and the Lord Chamberlain. The Queen was borne by Count Ludes in white satin, with a magnificent train of ermine, and wore the Royal crown. The Bishop of Christiania pronounced a blessing upon the King and Queen, and the Archbishop then delivered an address to the King, and one for ever." The King took the oath to sustain the rights of the Church, and the Archbishop then anointed the Queen between the shoulders. The Bishops of Bergen and Drontheim anointed the King on the forehead, breast, and shoulders. The Archbishop then delivered an address to the Queen, and the ceremony was concluded by C. Arnold, with words by Professor A. Munch, concluded the ceremony, and the procession returned to the palace amid the cheers of the people."

MONTREAL AND CANADA EAST.

Canada West, according to arrangements, was to visit this city during the present month, but by the last steamer from Liverpool we learn that the Victoria Railway Bridge is not likely to be completed for the opening. America, and the great points of entry for the commerce of Canada, both by canal navigation, and by lake and canal navigation, are Quebec and Montreal. Both on Lac, a distance of 180 miles, and the former of 300 miles from the sea, are the most commanding positions for the defence, and local trade, and for the sales of timber, and the other products of these districts, while in the winter they are the ports of export, and the great centres of distribution. Both deg., as in nature when looking towards the sun, at the left; 180 deg., or the south point, at the bottom; and 270 deg., the west point, at the right hand.

I have before stated that during the eclipse I continued to observe the phenomena with a telescope, and during the totality I was able to make two complete sketches of the prominences on diagram 1. Had drawn out previously, with lines corresponding to those ruled on a piece of glass placed in the focus of the eyeglass. The eyepiece, glass micrometer, was capable of rotation through an arc of 90 deg., so that I was able rapidly to measure the angle of position and extent of the prominences. My drawings were made in reference to the vertex, and not like the photographs in reference to a circle of declination. On comparing my sketches with the photographs I was much gratified to find that their general accuracy was completely confirmed.

I was much surprised on withdrawing the dark glass, some minutes before the totality, to find that I could distinctly see the whole of the lunar disc, and a luminous prominence on the east of the zenith. This was quite visible, while the sun's image reflected by a glass surface fixed at an angle of 45 deg., in the eyepiece, and the intensity of its light consequently much diminished. The upper surface of the glass, diagonal reflector of I had, however, silvered to the extent of one-half, and, as I brought into action the silvered half just previous to totality, I perceived a large sheet of prominence on the east. A little to the east of the zenith a brilliant cloud, quite detached from the sun, and at some distance from the moon, came into view. A few degrees to the west of the zenith a minute point was perceived at the commencement of the totality. South of the vertical only one small prominence was perceived.

The brilliancy of these prominences was wonderfully great and far exceeded that of the corona. Much detail was visible in the prominences both of light and shadow and configuration. No appearance of Baily's Beads was seen.

Although my drawings were made in reference to the vertex, it will be better to describe the details as they are shown in the photographs in relation to the circle of declination.

The prominences were not uniform in tint, and, with few exceptions, they did not present any colour approaching to that of rose. I have had, however, a decided but faint rose tint. At 57 deg. was situated the northern extremity of a remarkable detached curved cloud, which, when first seen, was about half a minute (14,000 miles) beyond the position occupied by the moon's dark limb. It presented a double curvature on its northern side, both curvatures being convex towards the north. It inclined in a curved direction at about an angle of 60 degrees from a radius towards the east, and was a minute and a half (42,000 miles) long. As the moon glided onwards in her course she approached it gradually, and at last touched the extreme point of this floating cloud, which glowed with all the brilliancy of one of our own terrestrial clouds at sunset. It presented a decided rose tint.

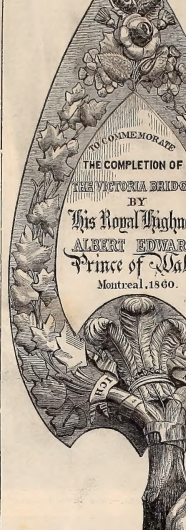
At 72 deg., from the north a protuberance, in shape reminding one of a bouserang, imprinted itself on the sensitive plate, although it was not visible to me in the telescope. The stem was two minutes long (56,000 miles); the point was bent towards the north, inclining downwards over towards the extremity of the detached cloud. It is a very curious circumstance that this protuberance imprinted itself distinctly, although it did not attract the eye directed especially to that locality. This may be accounted for on the supposition that it emitted a reddish purple light.

The course of some of the eastern luminous prominences next to the moon was, when first seen, very irregular, and far more so than was attributable to mountains as seen in profile on the moon's edge. This irregular outline may, however, be explained by supposing these prominences to have been first seen floating like clouds in a transparent atmosphere at some little distance from the sun's surface, and subsequently from the moon's edge—a supposition which is supported by the fact that one such prominence or luminous cloud was seen distinctly detached, and at some distance from the dark moon.

As the moon glided over the sun's disc the inner outline of the protuberances in the eastern hemisphere became less and less indented, and at last they were bounded by the nearly even outline of the moon's limb. At the eastern prominences became gradually covered a mountain-like peak, seen at first as a mere point in the north-west quadrant, gradually grew in dimensions, then presented enough points, and at last resembled somewhat a colossal ship in full sail; and, extending from this through an arc of 60 deg., there came into view in the north-west quadrant a long streak of luminous prominences, varying in breadth, and with a few points projecting outwards. This streak became very jagged in its inner outline as the moon glided off from it, just previous to the sun's reappearance, these luminous prominences presenting the same phenomena as those on the eastern edge—that is, appearing like clouds floating in a transparent atmosphere a little distance from the sun.

The irregularity of the inner edge of the long streaks of luminous prominences is shown in the photographs, and therefore cannot be set aside as an optical illusion. As the prominences which we see beyond the sun's limb on the occasion of a total eclipse are nearly such as are seen in profile, from their situation it is fair to presume that they must exist pretty generally diffused all over the sun's photosphere, and that they must be at all times visible either as light or dark markings on the sun's disc. Whether they are the luminous matters on the facule or the darker portions (not the spots) of the sun's mottled face, or whether they may not in some cases appear more bright, and in others less bright, than the general brightness of the sun's disc, must still be a matter of conjecture. It is an interesting fact, however, that on the 19th and 20th a large series of facule surrounding some small spots came round into view by the sun's rotation, and were photographed, which must have occupied nearly the position of the brightest portion of the streak of prominences on the south-eastern quadrant.

I had but a very little time to spare for observations of the effect of the eclipse on the landscape, but I remarked that when the sun was reduced to a small crescent the shadows of all objects were depicted with wonderful sharpness and blackness; and as I cast my eyes on the spectators and the landscape they appeared as if illuminated by the electric light, so brilliant were the lights, so sharp and black were the shadows. The sky began to assume an indigo tint, and the landscape to be tinged with a bronze hue. Casting my eye for a few seconds away from the telescope at the moment of totality to behold the corona and the surrounding landscape, I was much surprised to find that the darkness was not so intense as I had anticipated. I had a lamp at hand, but I had no occasion to use it in making my drawings. The deep indigo of the upper part of the sky shading through a tints that into red and orange as it approached the horizon, the deep blue of the moon as contrasted with the brilliant emerald tint of the sky and the peculiar light cast on the spectator, impressed me with a feeling of solemnity never to be effaced from my memory, and which was enhanced by the ear catching the sound of the village bells, which it appears had been tolled during the eclipse. I saw two stars to the east of the sun, which I believe to have been Jupiter and Venus, and observed that the corona did not extend generally more than about eight-tenths of the diameter of the moon beyond her limb, but that there were outlying rays of greater extent. A thought of my duties recalled me, after a few seconds' gaze, from this enchanting scene, and I did not attempt any exact observations of the corona.



The two days succeeding the eclipse were employed in making observations, and in printing off by copies from the plates of the totality, and one from each of the phases of the eclipse; since which time I, and also other copies have been taken.

The Astronomer Royal, who was immediately informed of what had been done at our station, paid us a visit on the 19th, and examined the results. This visit, which was gratifying in other respects, afforded an opportunity for comparing chronometers. The geographical position of his station at Powis, which was ascertained with considerable accuracy by Mr. Struve, Dr. Winnecke, and M. Oom of Pulkowa, has since been corrected with my own by a survey made by Mr. Preston.

Within telescopic view of our observatory Mr. R. Beck and Mr. Bonomi were stationed; the former was occupied in observing whether the light of the corona gave indications of polarisation, and the latter gentleman in making observations of the colour of the sky and landscape during the eclipse. They will take their own opportunity of publishing the valuable results they obtained, but I can do them no harm by stating that they successfully accomplished their mission.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

TROWEL USED BY THE PRINCE OF WALES IN THE COMPLETION OF VICTORIA BRIDGE.

TO-DAY, according to a memorandum which has been issued detailing the arrangements made for the tour of the Prince of Wales in British North America, the Victoria Bridge over the St. Lawrence will be completed and formally opened by his Royal Highness. We give an Engraving of the Trowel with which the Prince will perform the crowning act of masonry to this magnificent structure. The beaver (a popular emblem of this important colony) forming the handle of the trowel is modelled from nature. The branch of the tree on which the animal is placed, and the leaves which spring from it and form the border of the blade, are the Canadian maple, also an attribute of the colony. The national emblem, the rose, shamrock, and thistle, and the Prince of Wales's plume, &c., speak for themselves. The reverse of the trowel has a superb engraving of the Victoria Bridge, from a photograph. The whole of this graceful piece of art-workmanship is executed in precious metal from originally original models, and is the work of Messrs. Phillips, Cockspur-street.

MEDAL STRUCK TO COMMEMORATE THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO CANADA AND THE INAUGURATION OF THE VICTORIA BRIDGE (ON THE 20TH INST.)

THE GREAT SALT LAKE.—The waters of this lake leave traces of salt at all the shores. Not a fish can live in them; and beasts must stooped in them for twelve hours requires no other conceiving preparation. To the east of Fort Buenaventura are two islands covered in spots with white snow, or salt. From its centre rise numerous mountains, the islands planted in a sea of brine. Beyond this gulf commences the desert of the seventy miles. The malediction of Heaven seems to weigh heavily on the solitude, which reminds one of the barrenness of the Dead Sea, where before stood Gomorrha were destroyed. To the east were inaccessible mountain ridges and blood-coloured rocks dotted with green spots; on their flank undulated dark clouds; whilst thick vapours moved above their summits, like the smoke of a volcano upon a serene sky. Large masses were perched at twilight here and there its vague glimmer, and danced over the waters, looking like coupe tinged with the most lively pink; this coupe spread over the horizon as transparent veil that shed upon nature the charm of a faint light, which, as it gradually rose to the summit of the mountains, assumed a more sombre hue, as indescribable, dismal appearance that filled the soul with sadness and the eye with tears. This lamentable valley, of a hopeless and terrible aspect, recalls to mind that of Jehoshaphat, the valley of groves. An imposing silence continually reigns around this melancholy abode, which might well be called the "Lake of Death." On its sterile strand, on the periphery of its banks, you never hear the patter of the rain, the whistle of the wind, the leaves falling from the trees, the chirp of the birds, nor the swallow's rapid flight, through the air. All is calm and gloomy, like the realm of eternal repose. Nature is motionless and dead, in the day of wrath, and cannot cast these solitudes an account of the crimes of the intellectual beings who inhabit them. Such is the picture presented the sands of the deserts.—Seven Years' Residence in the Great Deserts of North America.

THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

HIS Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will, it is expected, visit the Niagara Falls about the 10th of September. A correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer gives the following account of the preparations for the reception of the Prince:—Niagara Falls is a spot that the Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will, during his sojourn at the Falls, have his quarters in the handsome private residence of the late Samuel Zimmerman, on the Canada side, just in the rear of the Clifton House, which also belongs to the estate of the same family. The Zimmerman homestead has been churchwise for many years the seat of the Hebbes, while the cottages attached to the Clifton Hotel have been occupied for the same purpose by the Lanes in which the Prince will reside is a substantial dwelling of stone, covered with cement, and stands upon the highest part of a beautiful park of twenty acres, commanding a full view of the Falls and the neighbouring scenery. The grounds are surrounded by a fine hedge of privets, rendered impenetrable by the addition of a strong wire fence on the outside. From the eminence upon which the house is situated the ground descends towards the Niagara River on the south, first abruptly through a belt of forest trees, and then gradually across a broad, smooth lawn, neatly ornamented with shade trees, and containing a fountain and a great number of gas-lights. The house becomes gradually the property, and also upon the highest point in the grounds, flagstaffs eighty-five feet in height will be erected, from which during the stay of the Prince the Royal standard of Britain will float."

The Niagara River, forming part of the boundary line between the United States and Canada, issues from the north-east end of Lake Erie, and flows into Lake Ontario, which is 334 feet lower than Lake Erie. About three miles from Buffalo the river widens to the size of about thirty-three miles. Near the place where it issues from Lake Erie the river is scarcely more than a mile wide, but it soon widens to two miles, and its current rapidly increases from three to seven or eight miles an hour. The course of the river in this part is nearly due west, and its banks rise, first to ten or twelve feet, and soon to twenty, thirty, and fifty feet, above the surface of the water. This rising of the banks is the result of a rise in the surrounding country, which, in fact, preserves its level in a continuous plain, but it is owing to the bed of the river descending on an inclined plane. The waters are running with great force about five miles from the lake, and driven back by the high rocky bank; for at this point the river suddenly contracts its width, and immediately afterwards precipitates the great volume of water is hurled down a perpendicular height of 160 feet into a terrible chasm. Goat Island divides the falls, which island is about 320 yards wide and 162 feet high; but between the island and the Canadian side it is 700 wide and 150 feet high. Both Falls unite before they are lost in the gulf below. The American current descends nearly in a perpendicular line, and is divided into two cataracts by a small rock. The fall on the Canada side is only ten yards wide, and is called the Cataract of Montmorenci. The Canadian cataract rolls over a precipice projecting about fifty feet beyond its base, and the falling waters form a curve, between which and the rock itself persons may proceed thirty or forty yards. This is called the Horseshoe Fall. Below the Falls the river runs with considerable rapidity between banks from 200 to 300 feet high. These banks are perpendicular for about half these distances towards the river they form a slope composed of the fragments which have fallen from above. Four miles below the Falls, in a semicircular basin, there is a terrible whirlpool formed by the rush which descends into the vortex with furious impetuosity, and rushes out between a narrow passage formed by perpendicular cliffs. From this whirlpool the river passes the low ridge called Queenston Heights, and enters the level country which surrounds Lake Ontario.

The pen, the pencil, and photography have all been laid under contribution for the purpose of describing and illustrating the Falls of Niagara. Some of the—some of the—some of the—some of them with great success—to reproduce in other minds the impression made on their own by this mighty cataract; and brilliantly-written and powerful passages from several sources suggest themselves to the memory. It is, however, but to the most graphic of these that this occasion permits us should be yielded to our cousins across the Atlantic; for what more suitable than that an American should give the proper idea to readers on the New World?

In addition, then, to the above details of the River and Falls, which may be looked upon as a mere copy of a cicerone, necessary both tedious, we give, in connection with our Engravings, some portion of Mr. N. P. Willis's description of Niagara Falls, in which it will be seen that he has risen to the grandeur of his theme:—

"Niagara is the outlet of several bodies of water, covering, it is supposed, 150,000 square miles! It is necessary to remember the extent of the waters which feed Niagara to conceive, when standing for an hour only on the perpetual rocks, how this almighty wonder can go on so long. Even then—that these inland seas lie above, tranquil and unchanged, source varying their high-water mark perceptibly, from year to year, yet supplying for every hour the "ninety millions of tons" which it is estimated plunge over the cataract—it affords you a standard for the extent of those lakes to which the utmost stretch of the mind seems scarcely competent. The broad flood glides out of Lake Erie with a confiding tranquillity that seems to you, when you know its impending destiny, like that of a human creature advancing irresistibly, but unconsciously, to his death. He embraces the bright islands that part his arms for a caress; takes into his bosom the calm tribute of the Tonewanta and Tuscarora—small streams that come drowsing through the wilderness—and flows on, till he has left Lake Erie far behind, bathing the curving sides of his green shores with a surface which only the summer wind ruffles. The channel begins to descend; the still unsuspecting waters fall back into curling eddies along the banks, but the current in the centre flows smoothly, till suddenly the forceful stream is flung with accumulated swiftness among broken rocks; and, as you watch it from below, it seems tossed with the first shock into the very sky. It descends in foam, and from this moment its agony commences. For three miles it tosses and resists, and, racked at every step by sharper rocks and increased rapidity, its unwilling and choked waves fly back to be again precipitated onward, and at last reach the gloomy curve, convulsed with supernatural horror. They touch the emerald arch, and in an instant, like the calm that follows the conviction of inevitable doom, the agitation ceases,—the waters pause—the foam and resistance subside into a transparent stillness, and slowly and solemnly the vexed and tormented sufferer drops into the abyss. Every spectator, every child, is struck with the singular deliberation, the unnatural slowness, with which the waters of Niagara take their plunge. The laws of gravitation seem suspended, and the sublimity of the tremendous gulf below seems to check the descending victim on the verge, as if it paused in awe.

"The best way to approach Niagara is to go up on the American shore and cross at the ferry. The descent of about two hundred feet by the staircase brings the traveller directly under the shoulder and edge of the American Fall—the most imposing scene, for a single object, that he will ever have witnessed. The long column of sparkling water seems, as he stands near it, to descend to an immeasurable depth, and the bright sea-green curve above has the appearance of being let into the sky. The tremendous power of the fall, as well as the height, realises here his utmost expectations. He descends to the water's edge, and embarks in a ferry-boat, which tosses like an eggshell on the heaving and convulsed water; and in a minute or two he finds himself in the face of the vast line of the Falls, and sees with surprise that he has expended his fullest admiration and astonishment upon a mere thread of Niagara—the thousandth part of its wondrous volume and grandeur. From the point where he crosses to Table Rock the line of the Falls is measurable at three quarters of a mile and it is this immense extent which, more than any other feature, takes the traveller by surprise. The tide at the Ferry sets very strongly down, and the athletic men who are employed here keep the boat up against it with difficulty. Arrived near the opposite landing, however, there is a slight counter current, and the large rocks near the shore serve as a breakwater, behind which the boat runs smoothly to her moorings. It may be remarked that the well-known simile in the 'Fall of Terni, in the fourth canto of 'Childe Harold,' are, in many respects, singularly and powerfully descriptive of Niagara.

"The Rapids are far from being the least interesting feature of Niagara. There is a vividness and a power in their foaming career which is seen in no other phenomenon of the same class. Standing on the ridge which connects Goat Island with the Main, and looking up towards Lake Erie, the leaping crests of the rapids form the horizon, and it seems like a battle-charge of tempestuous waves, animated and infuriated, against the sky. No one who has not seen this spectacle of turbulent grandeur can conceive with what force the swift and overwhelming waters are flung upwards. The rocks, whose soaring points show above the surface, seem tormented with some supernatural agony, and fling off the wild and hurried waters as if with the force of a giant's arm. Nearer the plunge of the Fall the Rapids become still more agitated; and it is almost impossible for the spectator to rid himself of the idea that they are conscious of the abyss to which they are hurrying, and struggle back in the very extremity of the horror. This propensity to invest Niagara with a soul and human feelings is a common effect upon the minds of visitors in every part of its wonderful phenomena. The torture of the Rapids, the clinging curves with which they embrace the small rocky islands that live amid the surge, the sudden calmness at the brow of the cataract, and the infernal writhe and whiteness with which they reappear, powerless from the depths of the abyss, all seem, to the excited imagination of the gazer, like the natural effects of the impending ruin, desperate resolution, and fearful agony, on the minds and frames of mortals."

Niagara Falls village—an Engraving of which, from a sketch by the Special Artist of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS in North America, is given on the first page of our present Number—is situated just above the American Fall, and contains churches, hotels, and manufactories of steam-engines, woollen cloth, and paper, with corn and saw mills. Its population is over 1000. The Buffalo and Lockport Railways meet here.

THE SESSION OF 1860.

FROM time to time we hear it stated that this or that Session of Parliament will be memorable in history for some reason or the other. Of a surety the Session of 1860 has claims to be considered as more than ordinarily remarkable. The extreme length to which it has extended would alone render it extraordinary, but it has some features which are still more notable than its duration. At the first glance it would seem as if it ought to be characterised as a Session of failures, but that designation cannot be affixed to it in its integrity. Much, very much, has been done in the way of legislation which is calculated to fix an indelible mark on the social, commercial, and, in a certain sense, on the political condition of the country. New influences springing out of the assertion of principles comparatively though not wholly new, but which are fully recognised, have been introduced into our fiscal system, which of themselves would be sufficient to signalise the legislative year, and which are destined, as we believe, to work out a great revolution for ultimate good to England, in the development of her resources and the promotion of her prosperity. Apart from this it would, perhaps, not be too much to admit that this has been a Session of disappointments, so far as the fulfilment of the promise of great measures is concerned. A retrospect of the proceedings of Parliament during its long and laborious sitting, from the 24th of January to the 28th of August, must of necessity be replete with significant warning, and suggestive of examples of what to do and what to avoid in the congenial season of next year.

The Speech from the Throne was a full and lofty programme. The nation was to be put into a satisfactory state of defence; a reform in the representation of the people was promised; the laws of bankruptcy, and of the transfer of land, were to be improved and settled; the criminal law, at least, was to be consolidated; an advance was to be made in the direction of the fusion of law and equity; the Corporation of London was to be remodelled; and endowed charities were to be placed on a more advantageous footing. Beyond all this there was the Commercial Treaty with France, of which we knew something; and the large and comprehensive Budget, of which we knew nothing until after the exciting suspense caused by Mr. Gladstone's illness had been ended by the delivery of that magnificent oration which for a time swept before it every vestige of opposition. The first symptom of a stand was made by the statement of the Opposition, on coming to a discussion on the question of the ratification of the treaty as a whole before the acceptance of the items of its provisions, which were especially connected with the Budget. This effort signally failed in both Houses, as did the resolution moved by Mr. Du Cane in favour of the financial policy of the Government; and, afterwards, the formal reception of the treaty in each House, and the subsequent carrying of the increased Income tax, the reduction of the wine duties, and the abolition of the duties on butter, cheese, and a number of minor articles which only incumbered the customs tariff, served to have added the crown to that career of triumph which the Chancellor of the Exchequer ran through the first weeks of the Session. His first check was the diminished majority on the abolition of the excise duty on paper in the Commons, and the rejection of the bill in the Lords. Both these were but trifling drawbacks as relating to wine licenses and refreshment-houses in the face of a powerful organisation against it. Before leaving the large share which Mr. Gladstone took in the business of the year there should be mentioned his success in reducing the customs duty on foreign paper, and his ungrudging pledges, by which £3,000,000 was added to the supplies for the China war, and £2,000,000 to meet Exchequer bills and bonds becoming due, and to provide against emergencies in the event of a bad harvest. His course, so victoriously begun, was not a little chequered ere it closed.

The Estimates for the Army and Navy, the largest on record in times of peace, were carried without much difficulty, and the subsequent vote for fortifications could hardly be said to have met with any serious opposition; nor should it be forgotten that a very considerable portion of the reform of the code by which the discipline of the Navy is secured was passed with general concurrence; while encouragement was given to the volunteer movement by the assent to an Act which enables that force to obtain suitable grounds for rifle practice. The militia, also, was dealt with, and the system of its local organisation was carried. Although subjected to long discussions, the bill for the abolition of the local European force in India became law in due course.

After an enforced delay, caused by the pressure of the measures of finance, the Reform Bill was introduced on the 1st of March, it was debated in a very singular manner; acquiesced in, so far as principle was concerned, by the Opposition, and only attacked, and at length defeated, in consequence of the objections taken to its details in the first instance by the members of the Liberal party. How far it may have been a proper course for its ultimate rejection. We are not prepared now to argue that question; but what is certain is, that it owed its actual defeat more to the tactics of delay, and speaking against time, than to any positive and direct hostility. Indeed, in the Lower Commons had been shown in its desire to see a Reform Bill, the time occupied in preliminary discussions after the second reading was agreed to would have sufficed to have modelled a satisfactory if not an extensive measure. Law reform fared little better. The Bankruptcy Bill was floating away in the full tide of success when it accidentally went down into the fatal seas of next Session. The Transfer or Landed Estates Bill only appeared on the notice-paper: it died in its earliest infancy. The Law and Equity Bill, as it became a statute, somewhat extended the equitable jurisdiction of the common law courts. A measure for remodelling the office of coroner was rejected. The Savings Bank and Friendly Societies Bill, which dealt in a comprehensive manner with the subject-matter to which it related, was reduced to two clauses of comparatively minor import in the Commons, and after having been made the test of another struggle between the Upper and Lower Houses, in which the latter wisely gave way, became law, such as it was. Among general measures, the bill for the reform of the Corporation of London never reached a second reading; measures for the abolition of church rates, or for some compromise in reference to that vexed question, occupied much time in the Commons, and when Sir J. Trelawny's bill reached the Lords it was contumaciously thrown out by a large majority.

As we look through the long list of legislative attempts we find that something has been gained by the Act which provides for Public Improvements by Local Rating. The final alteration and simplification of the law which admits Jews to Parliament deserves notice, as do the Acts for Protecting Women and Children in Bleaching and Dyeing Works, and that for Preventing (if possible) Adulteration of Food and Drink. Then the Acts for the Improvement of the Tenure of Land in Ireland, the Irish Landlord and Tenant Bill, and the Act for the Suppression of Party Emblems, are to be noted; while much was done towards the vindication of the system of National Education in Ireland against the twofold opposition which has been raised against it. The Abolition of the Edinburgh Annuity Tax Bill, and several measures relating to the law of Scotland, were passed, we believe to the satisfaction of Scottish members. The Poor-law Board has been continued for three years; the Galway Packet Subsidy was granted on the grounds solely of good faith; the Grant for Education in England has been increased on the understanding that the system is to receive a thorough examination, and the respective claims of ragged, industrial, and the existing schools will then be duly settled.

Besides the change made in the organisation of the Indian Army, measures were introduced for the management of the East India Stock to the Bank of England, some minor alterations in the executive and administrative departments of the local Government in India have been authorized, and power has been given to raise a loan in this country on the security of the Indian revenues if it should be found to be necessary. Among the remarkable occurrences of the Session was the singular hostility raised by the Dissenting body against the provisions in the Census Bill for ascertaining the religious persuasion of every inhabitant of a house by means of an enforced inquiry. This proposed enactment was given up by the Government, although it is believed it might have been carried by the assistance of the regular Opposition.

There can be little doubt that one of the most exciting and important, if not the most exciting and important event of the Session, has been the collision, or at least no less, of the two Houses on the question of privilege. Notwithstanding a strange adhesion on the part of many of the staunchest sticklers in talk of the privileges of the House to the aggressive policy of the Lords, notwithstanding the somewhat trimming course taken by the Government—Gladstone professing in words to be asserting a principle—notwithstanding the absence of a stern and uncompromising vindication of the rights of the representatives of the people—it may well be believed, and subsequent events have gone far to prove it that the Lords have accepted the warning which they have received, and if they do not, for ever, before they attempt another attack on the undoubted province of the House of Commons.

Of course foreign policy has had its share of consideration in the debates of the Session which has just terminated. In the whole of that policy, as pursued by the Earl with the Government, and there have been few, if any, who have denied that the honour and the influence of England have been maintained, although no overt or violent acts have been the result of the policy of the Minister for Foreign Affairs. It can hardly be doubted that at this moment the policy of England is triumphant in Europe, whether it be seen in the altered and more moderate tone adopted by France, in the united condition of Germany, or in the rapid progress of liberty and the hopes of constitutional government in Italy.

This sketch of the general and perhaps imperfect sketch of the main features and incidents of the past Session naturally leads to the consideration of its results. If it be true that much, very much, has been left undone, we are fain to hope and willing to believe that at least much has been, or ought to have been, learned. Several measures were introduced in the Commons in reference to the preparation and the management of its measures in another year; and, although the hope and expectation are slighter here, it cannot but be surmised that the House of Commons will have learned that its province is not merely the vindication of its liberty of speech, or means of perpetual, never-ending, and obstructive debating of everything under the sun. The comparative barrenness of a Parliamentary sitting of nearly seven months ought to inculcate the lesson that talk, although the special privilege of a representative assembly, is, nevertheless, only the accessory and not the action. This somewhat paradoxical assertion is fully comprehended by those who have studied our institutions in their origin and their integrity. If then, the shortcomings, so far as actual legislation is concerned, of the Session of 1860 should have taught members of the House of Commons that they have something to do besides making speeches, on the whole the time which it has occupied will not have been thrown away,

The new Act imposing a stamp upon contract notes came into operation on Monday last.

The Englishwoman's Journal for September was printed by female compositors at the Victoria Press.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has addressed another long letter on the education question to Lord Palmerston.

The number of Acts of Parliament passed in the late Session, which commenced on February 21 and ended on August 28, was 150 public and 202 local Acts.

THE HARVEST.—The Bishop of London has addressed a letter to the clergy of his diocese to the following effect :—" Rev. and dear Brethren, I doubt not that, in common with myself, you have from time to time used in your churches the appointed prayer for the blessing of the prospects of the harvest; and I do not consider it unfit for me to claim, as I have a right to suppose you the propriety of your doing so, that, in the present month, some such Service (for which those that may be convenient I would name Sunday the 9th of September) be generally observed throughout the diocese, as a day of humiliation and prayer to Almighty God for the removal of his judgments, and the continuance of his mercy to our land."—The Bishop of Oxford has addressed the following letter to the Archdeacons of his diocese :—" My dear Archdeacon,—The time appears to me to have come when the continuance of wet weather, by preventing the gathering in of the fruits of the earth in their season, may be considered as one of the judgments of Almighty God, to be averted by our humble prayer and intercession. I therefore request you to inform the clergy of your archdeaconry that it is my desire that they will say in the service of the Church the appointed prayer for fair weather." The Bishop of Rochester earnestly desires the clergy of his diocese to use the prayer for fair weather during the present month. The Bishop of Ripon has called the attention of the congregations should be directed to the importance of personal, humble, and earnest prayer at the throne of grace, as well as to the authorities and the country.—Other Bishops have addressed their clergy to the same effect.

THE IMPERIAL PROGRESS.

Their Majesties left St. Cloud on Thursday week, as stated in this Journal last week. On arriving at Dijon they were received with enthusiasm. The Mayor, in his address to the Emperor and Empress, said that the Government of the Emperor has carried the prestige of the country to a dazzling height. The Mayor then continued:—"When Europe appears to be always afraid of the power of your armies, she really fears much more the sympathies which you have brought forth among peoples." The Bishop of Dijon, in his speech, extolled the exploits of the Emperor's enterprise undertaken notwithstanding the distrustful exigencies of diplomacy. The Bishop expressed a hope that the Emperor would likewise triumph over the difficulties, almost impediments, which the same diplomacy, deserting from the path of right and justice, prepretends to impose upon the eldest son of the Church—upon the Emperor, the successor of Pepin and Charlemagne. The Bishop concluded by expressing a hope that the Emperor would succeed in preserving the revolutionary flood which menaces the patrimony of the Holy Father. The Imperial author of the "pernicious doctrines" contained in the celebrated pamphlet denounced by the Pope merely replied to this sally, as the Archbishop styled it, by "a few words of thanks." The following is the official report of the speech of the Emperor, in reply to the addresses of the civic authorities of Lyons :—

"I thank you for the manner in which you approve my efforts to increase the prosperity of France. Solely occupied with the general interests of the country, I have not all which may place obstacles in the way of development. Therefore, the unjust distrust existed abroad, as well as the exaggerated alarms and selfish prejudices in the interior, will not check me. Neither will make me deviate from the path of moderation and justice which I have followed, and which maintains Peace on the height of grandeur and prosperity that Providence has assigned her in the world. Therefore, give yourselves up with confidence to your labours, and remain faithful to me in our future. France gives in Europe the impulse to all great and generous ideas. She only suffers from evil thoughts. Her mission is depositary of the Revolutionary Banner of God, she shall not degenerate under my dynasty.

On Monday last the Emperor and Empress made their entry into Chambéry, the capital of one of the two provinces added to their dominions. The Mayor, in addressing to the Moniteur, were received with enthusiasm. The Mayor, in the speech he addressed to the Emperor, recalled the 'ardour and the national feeling which carried the inhabitants of Savoy to arms in 1792. In the evening a grand dinner took place, and the town was splendidly illuminated. On Tuesday the Emperor and Empress proceeded to the cathedral and the principal inhabitants of the department. Their Majesties then paid a visit to the principal church, and afterwards rode out in the neighbourhood of Chambéry. In the evening a grand ball was given in the theatre. A private despatch received from Chambéry states that their Majesties received Signor Farini and Count Cibrario.

A telegram from Annecy on Wednesday evening states :—"The Emperor and Empress have passed through Aix. At that town, as well as on their arrival here, they were enthusiastically received. Their Majesties will continue their journey on Saturday."

PAPISTS SECRET OF COUNT DE PERSIGNY.

The Count de Persigny, President of the Council of Privy, opened on Tuesday the sittings of the General Council of the department of the Loire with a speech in which the following is a summary :—

The Count commenced by observing that he was about to examine the existing probabilities of peace being maintained in Europe, and said :—

The Emperor's programme of Bordeaux has not been changed. Without pretending to absolve the future, I may say that, unless there should be interference of mere fighting for the sake of the vengeance for the defeats of the first Empire. Before the Congress of the powers to regulate the questions which were pending—viz., the question of the East and that of Italy, neither of which could be considered as settled diplomacy, all fears were resulting from these questions could not be avoided, they were carried out with promptitude; and the Government succeeded in the manner in which they were undertaken.

The declaration of Setastopol prevented Russia from taking possession of Constantinople, and the Eastern Question was confided to the charge of united Europe.

As regards the war in Italy, the Italian States were delivered from Austrian domination, and the principle of non-intervention, for the first time, although the Italians now jeopardise the independence which they acquired in consequence of the war, had the effect of consolidating the principle of peace in international policy, exercises a dominating influence over the further development of events.

These are the only questions which occupy the attention of Europe at the present moment.

The apprehensions entertained in Germany respecting the Rhine Provinces, and the fears of an invasion entertained in England, do not involve discussion. The Rhine is no longer a strategic frontier. France, being much stronger when formed into a single nation, has no prospect of German hostility for any composition she might obtain.

Concerning the relations between England and France, neither of these two Powers desires to enter upon such a terrible struggle as a war between them would be. The English Government, like ours, has every reason for the sentiment men in power desire to maintain a good understanding between the two nations.

In view of so many great results obtained by France, and the lustre which they throw around the Empire, the Emperor, it is natural to suppose, will distrust those have arisen in Europe. France, however, did not create the combinations in Italy, neither did she intend to follow the Italian policy which led to the rising of the Italians, nor is she responsible for the treaties which Austria concluded with the Italian Princes. France used every possible effort to prevent the conflict. If the Emperor kept silence before the outbreak of the war in reference to the intentions which gave rise to the Austrian ultimatum, it was with the motive of leaving the Italians in ignorance of his powerful assistance, which, he thought, would have given to their ardent spirit increased excitement amongst them.

The Count de Persigny said that the Emperor has been reproached was disadvantageous to himself alone.

The same can be said in reference to the cession of Savoy and Nice to France. The Italians, after the conclusion of the peace of Villafranca, having acted in violation of that treaty on the other side of the Alps, France could not renounce her Alpine frontiers, seeing that a great Italian kingdom had been constituted. France could not renounce those historical and natural boundaries on from England. She has deceived nobody.

The Emperor has certainly taken a decisive step in her legitimate position without shaking the confidence of Europe. Taken as a whole, his policy was pure and honest. If he has not been able to fully it was because the other Powers were not willing to engage their own responsibility. As soon as it was possible to arrive at the definite result, the Emperor withdrew from the world.

Since 1810 France has been forced to follow the rule imposed upon her by the Treaties of Vienna. Those treaties no longer exist, since the annexation of 1815 has been abstracted by Europe herself. This system was the result of a European combination which, by a reactionary effort, destroyed the work of the European equilibrium. Since then it has been the great interest of Europe that a general reconstruction should be effected from the basis of nationality, and that France should, by common consent, reassume the position which belonged to her before the Congress of 1815. She has begun this work, nor is threatened. Her work is achieved, and the mission of the new Empire is accomplished.

The military role of France in Europe is at an end. It affords me great pleasure to announce unanimity also exists as to peace and prosperity is now opening for Europe.

AUSTRIA.

The news from Vienna begins, in a very marked way, to foreshadow the early re-establishment of the Hungarian Constitution of 1848, together with the reforms of 1848. General Benedek communicated to the Emperor of Austria his disinclination to continue in his post—the Viceroyalty of Hungary, namely—as he thought his countrymen complaints quite right in the main. The Emperor has persuaded him to hold out until the decisive debate in the Council of the Empire will be over, when, as we already know, the majority is for a federal system of Government, such as would secure to the nationality and rights of Hungary being re-established. We are, besides, informed that frequent personal interviews are taking place between the Emperor and the Hungarian members of the Council. The proposals of the minority of the Council who, though perhaps going further in a democratic direction than their colleagues, still allow the connection of the various parts of the empire, has been published. It is as follows:—That his Majesty, by his own authority and power, should create such institutions as will allow the greatest possible development of the free and independent right of representation in all the provinces; and at the same time should, in the most complete manner, maintain the unity of the empire and of the legislative and executive power of Government. That, therefore, the effective and independent control should be exercised over the public administration by a proper representation of all the interests of the people in the communes, the Diets, and the Council of the Empire. These appearances, under every aspect, are favourable to a peaceful solution of the difficulties which beset the Austrian empire from within during the first days of next month.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) :—

SWITZERLAND.—Geneva, Thursday.—It is stated that the Federal Council, having been solicited by the French Government to send a deputation to Thonon to greet the Emperor, replied that there was no occasion to take such a step. The French Government continually occasion to take such a step. The French Government continually complains of ill-treatment of the French subjects in Switzerland. It is true proved that up to the present time those complaints were mere groaning at Homin.

SYRIA.—Beyrout, August 22 (vii Marseilles).—By order of Fuad Pacha severity individuals, convicted of having taken part in the late massacres, have been hung, and 110 scourged. He has compelled 6000 inhabitants of Damascus to enter the army. Four thousand two hundred soldiers of the French expedition have disembarked here. The cholera has not yet arrived.

UNITED STATES.—Queenstown, Thursday.—The Liverpool, New York, and Philadelphia Company's screw-steamer Manhattan, Captain Brooks, from New York on the 18th ult., has arrived here. She brings 753,000 dollars in specie. General Walker and his followers were conveyed to Honduras in her, as before stated, for a descent on Costa Rica or Nicaragua. Much excitement prevailed in Texas relative to the abolition question. Conspiracies increasing.

THE PAPAL STATES.

The people of Benevento, a district with forms part of the Pope's dominions, but governed by Neapolitan territory, have repelled a party of Papal soldiers or gendarmes who were sent without arms to reinforce the garrison; but the Governor appears to have succumbed to the revolt and intervention.

A political manifestation took place at Civita Vecchia on the occasion of the arrival of Mazzini, chief of the revolutionary committee. Several arrests were made.

Monsignore Merode Westerloo has left Rome for the departure of the volunteers under Catholicism, and the latter has left Rome.

The Pope is said to have expressed his readiness to agree to the proposal of an Italian Confederation.

UNITED STATES.

The New York Herald says the census returns were rapidly pouring into Washington, and would be completed to the extent of 20 by the 1st of September. It was confidently assumed that the total population of the Union will not fall short of 32,000,000, being an increase of nearly one-fifth on the census returns of 1850.

The American Scientific Association, which had been in session at Newport, Rhode Island, had adjourned sine die.

The Pennsylvania Democratic State Convention had agreed to form a presidential ticket, headed with the name of the rival of the democratic candidates—Breckenridge and Douglas—as the electors of the State at large; and that, in the event of the success of the whole ticket, the vote of the State shall be cast according to the result shall show which of the two tickets shall have received a majority of the votes cast in the State.

A terrific storm had passed over Portcrville. The water rose twelve feet, and swept away every house in the place. About one thousand persons were rendered homeless.
